Perfect Touch and Technique without Laborious Practice . .

The fundamental principles of my System have stood the test of time. Proof of this lies in the enormous number of pupils who have passed through my hands to piano-mastery—who have found in the System the Royal Road to the whole of the practical side of Pianoforte Playing, without any keyboard drudgery.

The results are frequently described by pupils as "miraculous," "magical," &c.

Pianists of every grade of proficiency can benefit from this simple, inexpensive, and unique Postal Course. Many eminent musicians, including the late Sir Frederick Bridge, have used and highly recommended my System—the ORIGINAL POSTAL SYSTEM.

18,000 Successful Pupils of all ages.

"From Brain to Keyboard"

Macdonald Smith's System of Pianoforte Playing.

Read my Illustrated Book, "Light on Pianoforte Playing."

This explains fully how I teach the System by a Series of Postal Lessons, and gives particulars of the very reasonable fee for tuition. No apparatus or special music necessary—just an easily acquired method with much quicker and BETTER results, based on my important discovery in physiology.

Apply for book to-day, but please do not omit to state whether average or advanced player, or, if a beginner, whether you can or cannot play at sight a simple hymn-tune. The book will be sent free of charge and post free.

MENTAL-HEARING

AND

HOW TO ACQUIRE IT.

A Teacher writes: "I urged that he should make a serious study of music, and, as a foundation, go through your Course of Mental-Hearing. I have pointed out that the full course would open the doors to all kinds of further study in Musical Dictation, Harmony, Counterpoint, Musical Form, Musical Appreciation, &c."

THE ability to HEAR MENTALLY seems to be possessed by few students, as the following from a well-known Musical Paper proves:

> "Harmony on paper is a dead thing except to those who can hear what they see—the possession of about one student in a thousand."

Mental-hearing will enable the student to hear in his mind the sounds of the notes he is writing on the paper; they will not be mere soundless signs, but each will convey a definite sound to him, and until they do so all written harmony is a waste of time.

The acquisition of Mental-hearing will materially assist the practical work of the pianoforte and organ student, for if the student can hear mentally he will be encouraged to study mentally. Mental-hearing is the key to mental study, and Mental study is the key to more rapid progress. The mastery of this subject will also improve the student's sight-reading, memorising, and transposing.

Mental-hearing is a necessity for candidates for Diplomas such as L.R.A.M., A.R.C.M., A.R.C.O., &c., and this work will also be of the greatest help to pupils preparing aural tests for the Associated Board Examinations.

A VOICE is—

1. MENTAL APPRECIATION OF TONE.
2. MUSCULAR EFFORT.

A good Teacher will help you with the first.

The Saxby Vocal Calisthenic Course will work wonders with the second.

The Course trains every little muscle used in singing and speaking.

RESULT: Power, Resonance, Brilliancy, Control, in fact all the qualities of a GREAT VOICE.

T. CHURCH SAXBY,

Studio: 3A, SEVEIRG BUILDINGS, LEWES.

FOR YOUR NEW YEAR RESOLUTION:

LEARN TO MEMORISE

Let 1925 see your memorising difficulties ended by taking the Mackinnon Musical Memory Course. Complete in six correspondence lessons, the Course provides a scientific and absorbing method by which any pianist or organist, even though totally unable to memorise at present, can acquire a thoroughly reliable musical memory.

Fifteen minutes daily is all the practice required. Teachers, students, professional musicians can take the Course without interfering with their daily work. Age is no difficulty. The Course has achieved equal success with pianists of 17 and 70!

There are no special papers to be answered—no extra music need be bought. Each lesson can be applied at once to the Music you are studying, with instant and gratifying results.

Send coupon below a for free booklet giving full particulars and numerous testimonials.

MACKINNON'S
MUSICAL MEMORY COURSE
FOR PIANISTS

EMPIRE HOUSE, 175 PICCADILLY, W.1.

IN SIX POSTAL LESSONS - FEE, £3:3:0

—GUARANTEE.—

You risk nothing in taking the Course, for under this guarantee your money is returned if you fail to make immediate progress.

If within four weeks of the receipt of the first lesson, and before the receipt of the second, any student should find that no progress has been made as a result of taking the course, Miss Mackinnon will unconditionally refund all fees received from such student.

Two typical letters received last month:

(a) "I am very pleased with the results. I have surprised a few of my friends who thought I could not play from memory. The instructions are so simply and clearly put that I don't think it is possible to fail."

(b) "I am finding the lessons invaluable, and am astonished at the confidence they give one. May I be added to the many who, I am sure, owe much and real gratitude to Miss Mackinnon for her extraordinarily clever and wise ideas."

LECTURES ON THE ART OF EASE IN SINGING.

Halifax. Mr. Asking, Secretary, Nov. 8, 1924.—"It was greatly enjoyed by the crowded and finely appreciative audience. It was something more than delightful and educative—it was unsurpassable in its popular appeal."

Barrow. Mr. Metcalf, Secretary, Oct, 30, 1924.—"It drew a record audience for our association, appealing strongly to both young and old, to the musical expert and to the layman. It is of outstanding merit.

MR. ALBERT GARCIA

LESSONS IN VOICE PRODUCTION AND SINGING

Special Coaching in Opera, Oratorio, and for Recitals.
Pupils prepared for A.R.C.M. and L.R.A.M. Exams.

"A number of Mr. Albert Garcia's pupils sang excellently at the concert which they gave on Wednesday evening. It was particularly pleasant to hear voices so well placed and well poised, smooth and even in tone from the lowest to the highest notes, showing a control which too few learn to exercise."—Daily Telegraph.

"One takes it that a concert by pupils fulfils its object if it demonstrates—as the one given at Wigmore Hall by Singers studying with Mr. Albert Garcia certainly did—the excellence of that master's method."—Era.

"Mr. Garcia—himself a fine artist and inheritor of a great tradition and a great name—has some most promising pupils, and such singers as Miss Rosa Burn and Mr. Frederick Lippold show in what an excellent school they have been trained."—Daily Telegraph.

PIANO PEDALS, with Octave Coupler

This wonderful invention supersedes all Piano Pedals, and is a Master Patent.

St. George's Hall, Liverpool,
9th April, 1921.

"The simplicity of the attachment, and the clever sixteen-feet, eight-feet, or both combined, 'OPTIONAL OCTAVE' contrivance, astonished me.

"I was delighted with the Pedal touch and with the variety in that touch, which your Attachment makes possible. It is very responsive to the movements of the feet, and is reliable."

F.R.C.O. AND A.R.C.O. PAPER WORK.

A SPECIAL COURSE OF CORRESPONDENCE LESSONS for the JULY, 1925, F.R.C.O. and A.R.C.O. Examinations is now commencing. The chief reason why this system of tuition is so successful is that pupils are taught how to work. Experience has proved that a large number of candidates fail because they do not reach a high enough standard in their work.

Special attention given to the Pianoforte Accompaniment Test, as most organ students fail to utilize the distinctive idioms of pianoforte writing, and make their work look like an organ accompaniment.

F.R.C.O. pupils are trained to work on a definite plan in such tests as Episode and Middle Entries, Stretto, and Song Writing, so as to acquire speed, which is a most vital factor, especially in the afternoon paper.

All the new tests will be covered in these lessons, and complete musical illustrations will be sent to each candidate showing exactly what the examiners require.

The whole aim of this method is to teach the principles which underlie all highly artistic music, and also the application of these principles to examination work, so that a pupil who is thus equipped is enabled not only to pass the F.R.C.O. or A.R.C.O. examination, as the case may be, but also to develop to the utmost the musical ability with which he is endowed.

Mr. Shakespeare's book is simple but sound in its advice to pupils on the art of singing.

The value of Mr. Shakespeare's teaching is to be found in the fact that the late Ffrangçon Davies and Webster Millar were his pupils.

And—Mr. John Coates was a pupil of Mr. Shakespeare too.

Plain Words on Singing is published by Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons Ltd., at 24, Bedford Street, W.C.2, and is on sale everywhere.

CHORALES

HARMONIZED BY

JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH

COLLECTED AND ARRANGED IN MELODIC ORDER

BY

H. ELLIOT BUTTON

This Collection of Chorales harmonized by Bach contains, it is believed, all those that he arranged for voices. It includes also an Index by means of which any Chorale can easily be found if the first few notes of the melody are known.

Price ... ... Cloth, Ten Shillings and Sixpence

SOME PRESS OPINIONS

DAILY TELEGRAPH

"The task of making this noble collection has been undertaken by Mr. H. Elliot Button, who has made the volume particularly useful to organists and choirmasters by arranging the chorales in melodic order and providing an ingenious Melodic Index by means of which a particular Chorale may be found in a moment. Organists, indeed, may find themselves in clover by exploring the latest publications of this house."

BIRMINGHAM POST

"The compiler of this volume is H. Elliot Button, who has made an ingenious musical index based on the first note of each melody. The system also allows of all the harmonizations of a melody being kept together, and the student of Bach will find this an extremely interesting volume."

DAILY MAIL

"Mr. H. Elliot Button is a hard and conscientious worker on behalf of music. His research work is invaluable, and his latest work of compilation has resulted in the collection of 'Chorales Harmonized by Johann Sebastian Bach' which appears to be the first complete and comprehensive edition in one volume . . . . The Melodic Index which Mr. Button has introduced, in addition to the usual indices, shows remarkable ingenuity. By recourse to this unique invention no difficulty is experienced in immediately satisfying one's requirements . . . . There is evidence of great painstaking labour in this work, and apart from its value as a work of reference, the collection is redolent of melodic and harmonic wealth which will be found useful by pianists and organists for many and varied purposes."

YORKSHIRE POST

"The chorales are most clearly printed on good paper, and the book is one that will commend itself to all church organists."

ABERDEEN PRESS AND JOURNAL

"A complete and reliable collection of chorales harmonized by Bach has long been needed. It now appears in a handsome edition published by Novello. No longer need the student laboriously plough through the oratorios, the cantatas, and the motets in search of the various harmonizations of this or that chorale. He will find them all in Mr. Button's book, together with those chorales used by Bach in works no longer extant, but which have been accepted as authentic upon the evidence of Bach's greatest son . . . . The present volume is invaluable; to the student a real boon, and a source of endless pleasure.

SUNDAY MERCURY

Messrs. Novello have given to the world a wonderful book. J. S. Bach was, is, and ever will remain the most wonderful of all the great masters. The book is collected and arranged in melodic order by H. Elliot Button, who has indeed done the work with competence and amazing thoroughness."

YORKSHIRE HERALD

"The collection is admirably arranged; a chronological index of titles, an ingenious melodic index, invented by the author, combined with excellent type and binding make it a handsome volume."

TABLET

"Mr. Elliot Button has become our benefactor in giving us a fine folio edition of the Bach chorales on a very convenient plan. The melodic index is so contrived that even when you have completely forgotten the words of a particular chorale it is soon hunted down. This well-printed volume is handsomely bound in cloth gilt."

CHURCH TIMES

"The Bach lover will be delighted to add this fine compilation to his music library."

XII.—EURHYTHMICS.—THE PRACTICE OF EURHYTHMICS.

"It was very much wanted, and now that it has arrived it proves to be the best book on the subject we have ever seen. . . . One would like to dwell lovingly on every stage of this monumental work did space permit, but it will only allow of a general commendation of every word from the beginning . . . to the end, which consists of music to accompany the rhythmic physical exercises."—The Morning Post, February 17, 1922.

"No teacher of singing should be without this wonderful book."—Musical Opinion.

"This is a thoughtful and thought-compelling book which touches life at most points. Eurhythm the author defines as perfect harmony, and discusses with a fine enthusiasm the practical means of bringing about in the individual this desirable condition. The book should be of great value to teachers of singing and physical education, while the intelligent student can also derive great benefit from a careful reading."—Glasgow Herald.

HENRY C. EMBLETON

The Musical Times

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR

JANUARY 1 1925

(FOR LIST OF CONTENTS SEE PAGE 79.)

HENRY C. EMBLETON

BY F. BONAVIA

I once met a 'patron' of music—he was a thoroughbred Teuton—whose conversation consisted entirely of the great things he had done and seen, and of the power he could, if he wished, exercise for the cause of music. As a matter of fact his actual achievements in the world of music consisted in foisting his acquaintance on more or less distinguished conductors, playing fifth drum in a Berlioz Symphony, and attempting to kiss a soprano singer who would have none of him. Mr. Henry C. Embleton—a true patron of music—is exactly the opposite of all this. He is modesty itself. Never by any chance can he be induced to talk of the things he has done, but he speaks with keen interest and penetration of all the questions affecting English music. And he speaks with authority, for he has known personally all the great musicians of the era which began with Joseph Barnby and reaches now to Elgar, of whose work Mr. Embleton is a convinced admirer. Like most people who have had the advantage of comparing many times the three great oratorios, he prefers 'The Apostles' and 'The Kingdom' to the 'Dream of Gerontius.' That is also the view of the singers of the Leeds Choral Union, who have for 'The Apostles' an affection shared by no other modern work. Mr. Embleton is naturally proud of the achievement of the Choral Union. Choral singing delights him not less than orchestral music, and the performances of the Leeds Choir under Dr. Coward, it will be granted, have created a new standard in choral singing.

But it was not the desire to show our French neighbours what we can do that induced Mr. Embleton to undertake the onerous responsibilities of Parisian concerts by the Leeds Choir with the London Symphony Orchestra. It was rather his intention to establish an entente of music and musicians, and that object appears to have been reached—for shortly a work of Florent Schmitt will be performed at Leeds, and it is expected that other eminent musicians of France will accompany the composer to Leeds on that occasion. It is hardly necessary to point to the obvious advantages of such an interchange of visits—advantages which go far beyond the immediate gain of the musician. There is surely no better, more efficient, more pleasant way of studying and getting to know another people than through its artistic manifestation, and of all the arts music is the one which can be most easily approached. But such expeditions as the visit of the Leeds Choir to Paris are not to be lightly undertaken. Mr. Embleton has the technique of concert touring at his fingers' ends, being responsible for most of the visits paid by the Leeds chorus to other English towns. But even he, being determined that the thing should be done well or not at all, found many and unexpected obstacles in his way—not least, I imagine, Elgar himself, whose modesty at times almost goes to the point of pessimism, and who objected that nobody at Paris knew him (as he has been heard to say at other times that no one cares for his music). I do wish some of his friends would tell him that if there are still to be found people who do not care for his music there are also others who have found in it a message of such depth and grandeur that it influenced not only their artistic but their spiritual outlook on life. During a memorable performance of 'Gerontius' a famous Dutch singer who had never heard it before turned to his neighbour remarking that 'he had no idea such music was being written nowadays.' Lovers of Elgar are not a few, and they are not in this country alone. But in England Elgar has no stauncher, more devoted friend than Mr. Embleton.

The friendship is not all on one side, and there is a half promise that when the third and concluding part of the trilogy, which begins with 'The Kingdom,' is finished, the Leeds Union will have the honour of its first performance. When will that be? Well, like all Elgar's friends, Mr. Embleton has been urging the composer to place the coping-stone on the trilogy. Elgar, however, will not be hustled, and, of course, he is entirely right in this attitude. But—and this will be good news to many—there is reason to believe that he is giving the subject close attention. To say more at present may not be wise.

On the very day when I met Mr. Embleton the daily papers announced the decision of the Carnegie Trustees to help to some extent the British National Opera Company, which had lost at Leeds a thousand pounds in one week alone. Naturally enough, I asked the Yorkshire Mæcenas his opinion on this point. His views are extremely illuminating, for they surely represent the thoughts of many. We are all anxious that the B.N.O.C. should carry on, and should carry on creditably. Its name stands for something higher than box-office receipts. But it is often found that there is a very close connection between the two. Leeds has its concerts, and an operatic programme there is a sure attraction. Why, then, does the B.N.O.C. fail to draw the same public? It is inconceivable that Yorkshire audiences should hate scenery and the apparatus of the stage with such keen hatred as to make the difference between financial success and a loss of £1,000 a week. Mr. Embleton has a much more practical explanation. Referring to a recent concert performance of 'The Flying Dutchman,' he said that it was deeply enjoyed, and the 'Spinning Chorus was a marvel.' Now, to be quite candid, we do not remember any choral performance of the B.N.O.C. which could be described as 'a marvel.' In the circumstances, it seems inevitable that Leeds audiences should prefer the musically finer performance of the two. It must also be remembered that a deep affection for choral singing is a national characteristic; that English choirs are the best anywhere; that the man in the street knows more about choral singing than about any other musical manifestation. Is it not natural to expect a 'national' company of opera to honour this national tradition? And traditions have deeper roots in the North than in London. In Leeds and its neighbourhood something like a hundred and fifty performances of 'The Messiah' were given last Christmas: that gives us the measure of the Northern man's attachment to old customs. Opera, we cannot help thinking, would stand a much better chance of success in the North if it could prove that it is not a degenerate, but the robust and legitimate descendant of the choral oratorio. And it is not merely a question of tradition. Yorkshiremen have such keen ears that, Mr. Embleton assures me, they can tell in a moment by the tone of his voice whether a man belongs to the Eastern part of the county or to the West Riding.

Mr. Embleton is also anxious to do something towards establishing at Canterbury a musical festival on the pattern of the Three Choirs Festival. Just before the war, in July, 1914, a successful meeting was held there, but the difficulty seems to be the old prejudice against payment for admission at the Cathedral services. It is a prejudice which the learned divines who preach the opening sermon at the Three Choirs Festival invariably denounce, the argument used generally being that the labourer is worthy of his hire. Of course there is no serious argument against it. During certain hours the Cathedral remains open to worshippers, and, if not churchmen, custom has established a certain charge or donation for the collector at all functions. Surely there is no harm in having a special service to which the public is admitted and asked to contribute enough to cover the expenses and leave a residuum for a deserving charity.

Mr. Embleton does not like publicity. To quote his own words, 'I like to put chestnuts on the fire, but I don't like the public to know that I have done it.' This makes it difficult for the public—and the interviewer—to know of how many good impulses in our musical life he is the author. But what has been said is enough to prove that British music owes him a great debt of gratitude. And if the musical understanding with France so happily established by him were to develop, it will not be the musician alone that will know him for a benefactor.

FAIR PLAY FOR LISZT

By M.-D. Calvocoressi

Why is it that we never get a chance of hearing any of Liszt's best works in this country? Most people will reply that it is because these works have been tried and found wanting. My present purpose is to demonstrate that they have not been properly tried by the present generation. With regard to them, most people simply move in a rut—as indeed they do with regard to most of the classics. There is a good deal of truth in Anatole France's remark that, 'les œuvres que tout le monde admire sont celles que personne n'examine.' But whereas comparatively little harm ensues so far as works which everybody admires are concerned, the result in Liszt's case is great injustice, and a great loss to music-lovers.

How great the loss is will not be realised so long as people continue blindly to abide by the dicta current fifty years ago, and Liszt's great works are not performed frequently enough to enable the music-loving public to form its own unprejudiced estimate of them. An immense majority of this public knows absolutely nothing of Liszt's works, except what is said and repeated about them; and it is surprising how few of the people who write and advise on music have troubled to study them. I have told the story of a friend of mine who never misses a chance of assuring his readers that Liszt, as a composer, is no good at all, but whom five minutes of cross-examination revealed to be very slightly acquainted with a few of Liszt's compositions, and altogether unacquainted with the remainder.

A natural effect of this indifference is that previous verdicts are endorsed and transmitted unaltered—so that, naturally enough, the more trustful fraction of the public remains unaware that there might be reasons for submitting these verdicts to fresh verification.

There is, for instance, a passage in Dr. Pollitt's 'The Enjoyment of Music' (p. 97) which struck me as strangely familiar when first I read it:

> In Liszt's work, the subjects have no connection whatever with definite form: they are used to indicate individuals, ideas, or circumstances. Themes are used, for instance, to express 'bewildered inquiry,' 'anxious agitation,' 'love,' and 'mockery,' as well as to indicate each person concerned in the story.

Eventually this impression was explained through my having to consult afresh Parry's article 'Symphony' in Grove's Dictionary, where, sure enough, I encountered the following (vol. iv., p. 794):

> In Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony . . . subjects and figures are not used for the purposes of defining the artistic form, but to describe individuals, ideas, and circumstances. . . . Figures are used . . . to portray graphically such things as bewildered inquiry, anxious agitation, love, and mockery, besides the special figure or melody given for each individual as a whole.

Of course, this may be a mere coincidence; and independent investigation may have led Dr. Pollitt to formulate in all but identical words a verdict similar to Parry's, but going one better, and extending it so as to cover not merely the 'Faust' Symphony but, apparently, the whole of Liszt's work.

Even then, in the name of fair play, let nobody take verdicts of that sort for granted. One of the true reasons why Liszt's music is being given a bad name is that most of his admirers agree with his detractors in dealing with it as 'programme music.' Thereby they adopt the worst possible means of vindication, and provide detractors with the best possible means of attack. It would be more sensible to point out that Liszt's music—like everybody else's—should be judged as music. To steal a forcible illustration from Mr. Clive Bell, even if it were proven that a piece of music had been inspired by the smell of roast pork, we should still judge it on its merits and not on its derivation.

The 'no connection with definite form' is another matter. But it should be remembered that with most writers, 'definite form' simply means usual form, characterised by invariable land-marks. Wagner has rightly pointed out that in Liszt's works the form is 'on each occasion that which imposes itself as necessary.'

It is not with principles that I am concerned just now, but with practical issues. A not unexpected consequence of Dr. Pollitt's attitude towards Liszt's music is that in his enumeration of the chief writers of symphonies (and tone-poems) he finds room for Onslow, Ellerton, Michael Costa, Victorin de Joncières, and even for Gustave Charpentier's 'La Vie du Poète'—a strange thing indeed to include in a list of that kind—but none for the 'Faust' Symphony nor the 'Dante' Symphony. He simply dismisses Liszt with the mention:

> Franz Liszt.—The inventor of the name 'Symphonic Poem.'

It is deplorable that Liszt should be treated in the same casual way in quite a number of books on musical appreciation and of various other primers, when not altogether omitted—as, e.g., happens in Mr. Percy Scholes's 'Complete Book of the Great Musicians.' The first requisite for books aiming at elementary education is that they should be impartially informative. The list of Liszt's admirers is long enough, and comprises enough names of men whose opinion carries weight, to show investigators that Liszt's claim to greatness, although it may be discussed—like everybody else's—may not be ignored in so cavalier a fashion.

Under present conditions the ordinary music-lover is neither induced nor given a chance to know Liszt's music; for, as I began by saying, Liszt fares no better in the hands of most concert-givers than in those of most writers of primers. A few of his good pianoforte works, and now and then one or two of his good songs, are included in the usual repertory of recitalists—but very few. As a rule, it is the inferior pianoforte music and the inferior songs that are selected for performance.

This leads us to the other root of the trouble—Liszt has written an incredible amount of incredibly bad music. For this error he is paying a not quite unaccountable, but quite disproportionate, penalty. Very few members of the public are given a chance to hear, besides the weak stuff which should have dropped out of the concert world years and years ago, the works on the strength of which many place Liszt among the world's greatest composers. If he is represented at all at symphony concerts, it is generally (apart from the magnificent 'Danse Macabre' whose grim purposefulness is not everybody's meat, and does not come out unless both conductor and pianist have a very thorough undertsanding of the spirit in which the work was conceived) by a couple of tone-poems that represent him fairly well, but not at his best. I believe I am right in saying that his wonderful 'Faust' Symphony has been performed only twice in London since 1914, and that far more than ten years have elapsed since the last performance here of the 'Dante' Symphony. The admirable 'Nächtliche Zug' is, apparently, quite unknown to organizers.

Pianoforte arrangements of all the big orchestral works, except those published by Breitkopf & Härtel, are not easily procurable. Nor can you get arrangements of them for the piano-player. Even the list of works by him with which acquaintance can be scraped by means of the gramophone is as poor as it is short. Wherever you turn, you find evidence of neglect and indifference.

In 1912, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, lecturing on Liszt at the Royal Institution (the lectures were noticed in the Musical Times, April, 1912), said:

> Even now, I venture to say, there are some great works of Liszt's—such as 'Christus' for one—which either have as yet been inadequately presented, or are still unknown to the public and to a large number of musicians.

That twelve years later, and after many similar protests and warnings, the same thing can be said, is purely and simply a disgrace.

Another quotation from Sir Alexander's lectures may serve to throw additional light on Wagner's sentence previously quoted:

> Whatever changes in music Liszt wrought—and they are many—he never sought to destroy anything. He added and built, logically lengthening the identical lines which Beethoven was drawing in his latest and greatest works. What he did evidently came to stay; it has remained to inspire many men, who have carried those lines much further.

I do not intend to dwell on the last point made in the above paragraph. It is easy enough to show the extent of Liszt's influence on an enormous majority of the composers of his time and after—on Wagner and Franck, Saint-Saëns and Smetana, on the Russians and Strauss, on Ravel and Bartók. To many people, the temptation is great to think that the claims of fair play are satisfied when tribute is paid to Liszt the man and to the influence of his music upon the further evolution of musical art.

But the point is not only that so many composers, great and small, learnt from his music. Most of them admired it whole-heartedly, and proclaimed their admiration in unambiguous terms. Wagner may be a trifle self-conscious in the unwonted task of praising another composer's music: but there is no mistaking the significance of his 'Letter to M. W. on Franz Liszt's Symphonic Poems.' There was a time when Berlioz had high praise for Liszt's music. Saint-Saëns never ceased to proclaim its merits and to claim recognition for it. Borodin, Balakirev, Rimsky-Korsakov, and indeed most of the Russians, have shown in many ways that they loved Liszt's music for its own sake and not merely as a fountain from which to draw. I have quoted Sir Alexander Mackenzie's view. Ravel does not write much on musical topics, but all those who know him have heard him express his admiration for Liszt's music. Bartók has written (the sentence was quoted by me in the Musical Times, May, 1921, p. 335):

> Studying Liszt afresh, especially less popular works of his, such as 'Années de Pélerinage,' 'Harmonies Poétiques et religieuses,' the 'Faust' Symphony, and the 'Danse Macabre,' I discovered at last, beyond external features for which I had little sympathy, the composer's true significance. I discovered in him far greater genius than in Wagner or Strauss.

This is but a very short and rough list, which I could extend almost usque ad infinitum, in order to show that Liszt is essentially a musician's musician—which, after all, is only as should be. The actual flaws in Liszt's music, and even the things which one might be tempted to describe as flaws on the ground of personal preferences, are obvious. They can be discovered quickly enough without the help of a scholastic foot-measure and set of rules or labels. But what is needed in order to enjoy the beauties with which this music teems is a sensitive ear and a certain amount of musical imagination. Another thing is needed in order to judge Liszt's music fairly: an unprejudiced mind, endowed with the sense of proportion that will decide on the relative importance of flaws and beauties.

I gave up the task of enumerating the composers who love Liszt's music, and find the task of enumerating the critics who have written in praise of it even more hopeless. Readers may be referred, however, to Mr. Ernest Newman's 'Musical Studies,' and to his article in the Musical Times for October, 1911; likewise to an excellent article in Musical Opinion of December, 1924, by Mr. Cecil Austin—to quote only a few easily accessible instances.

By way of a practical remedy for the deplorable situations which I have outlined, I suggest that a fresh start be made with Liszt's music. I think that a close period for all but the very finest things in Liszt's output is no less desirable than the frequent performance of these finest things. I should like his inferior music to be forgotten—at least for a time—as thoroughly as that of other great masters is forgotten, and as thoroughly as the threadbare slogans about programme-music, and form, and vulgarity which are so freely bandied about should be forgotten. Let even a clean sweep be made of praises as well as of strictures, and the 'Faust' Symphony, the 'Dante' Symphony, the 'Graner Messe,' and another dozen or so of works that represent Liszt at his very best become known by all, to stand or fall on their own merits.

CONSERVATISM AND MODERNISM IN MUSIC

By Arthur L. Salmon

Politics have no place in music—except perhaps in the opinion of those who hold that music can embrace and express philosophies and metaphysics. It would hardly be fair to judge the Labour Party by the dismal melody of its 'Red Flag.' But undoubtedly the instincts and predispositions that differentiate our political ideals can and often do find a place in our musical proclivities, even when we are not political partisans at all. It is probably as true in relation to music as with other things, that each one of us is 'either a little Liberal, or else a little Conservative.' Divesting each term of any political significance, we may take conservative to mean an attitude more or less static but by no means necessarily reactionary; we may take liberal to mean more or less progressive but not necessarily revolutionary.

It may be a counsel of perfection to suggest that the ideal attitude would embrace both positions. To do so in politics is to be unpopular and misunderstood. People prefer a definite label. But in music, in art, in literature, a man may rightly refuse to label himself. It is also possible that our conservative or our progressive ideas may not be entirely consistent; they may not run evenly through the whole complex strain of our individuality. Personally, I find it quite possible to be a somewhat high Conservative in politics, and at the same time something of a Modernist—which is here a better term than Liberal—in music. But here again a certain element of the conservative comes in. No modernism is of any value if it ignores and cuts itself from the past. There must be continuity, succession. We cannot start afresh; we must build on tradition. And this, to my mind, must provide the wisest standpoint; a full recognition and enjoyment of whatever good has been passed on to us, with an equal recognition and enjoyment of whatever good is being given to us to-day. Is this possible? Perhaps not wholly, because of our limitations and our incalculable prejudices. The true critic tries to ignore personal bias, to forget his own constitutional preferences; but he can never wholly succeed. It may not be desirable that he should, for it would mean the loss of all character and colour. But it is surely possible to take the position in music that is taken, say, in literature; that is, to love the older classics, and to welcome the new things that may become classics some day. To love such moderns as Conrad or Henry James or Hardy need not mean neglect of Scott and Wordsworth; it need not mean that we forget Homer and Sophocles. Why should a love of Tchaikovsky or Debussy or Scriabin mean that we cast off Bach and Beethoven? It can only do so if we embrace that spirit which I have called liberal in music, at the utter expense of that sane conservatism which should go with it. It is the lack of this just balance that makes men furious partisans; and it is as regrettable in any art as it is in politics.

Of course it must be confessed that there are vast differences between older and later music—differences not so much of aim as of means. Our natures may not be becoming actually more complex, but it seems certain that our consciousness is doing so. Scientific advance has made us aware of far vaster complication in life than men formerly dreamed of. As a consequence, our emotional and imaginative elements crave a different measure of utterance. The old set forms suited their more simple and definite purpose. Some musical thinkers are fond of comparing music with architecture. It is always a far-fetched comparison; if it holds good at all we may say that the conservative clings to the clearly defined form, the clear-cut simplicity, of Greek building: the modernist inclines more to what is wrongly styled Gothic, with its complication, its decorative profusion, its love of the grim and grotesque as well as of the beautiful. The conservative loves the plainly enounced subject and its definite answer, a balance of rise and fall, a logical sequence as of question and reply, of statement and response or comment. But these things do not satisfy or speak for the whole of our natures; clear definition, logical statement and development cannot always give the whole of our imaginative and emotional complexity. They often fail in what we know as atmosphere. They may lack the glamour of the half-told, the half-seen. Rigid definition may fail in suggestiveness; in trying to tell all it may tell too little. This truth of art was known to some who were not moderns in our present sense; Bach knew it, Gluck guessed it, Beethoven knew it at his glorious best, Schubert and Chopin knew it. They were sometimes trammelled by tradition, at times they were even reactionary; but the great thing was there, and the utterances springing from it were such as no modernist would wish to leave behind him. We must be loyal to the greatness of the past, or we cannot rightly appraise the passing moment. There is undying continuity. The big things of the past are not to be excelled; we shall be rash if we say they can never be equalled.

It would be well for us to cast from our minds any such term as ancient or modern, if we find it affects our estimates. Beauty is not to be dated. But this justice that a modernist may pay to the past, should be matched by an equal fairness on the part of the conservative. He should admit that a new age may claim a new mode of utterance, although the human emotion and imagination that lie behind remain the same. Some of us may laugh at those who claim to see definite colour in music, but to assert that music contains architectural shape is no less an unnatural forcing of analogies. Music's mission is to do what the plastic arts and the art of words cannot do; if she tries to follow them, she is attempting a thankless task—attempting to achieve what other means can do better. It is only in their underlying spirit the arts are akin, and surely this is enough kinship; methods are in actual variance, the appeals are made through entirely different avenues. Perhaps we may claim that the best of modern music sees this clearly: not the music that seeks to be metaphysical or philosophical or even descriptive, but the music that aims to be lyrical, imaginative, suggestive, passionate. We may allow music to be a part of the Logos, the Word, the utterance, but it is not the whole; it has its defined place as a part and an expression of our life—not the whole of life, nor even an expression of the whole. It gives us what we bring to it; we find in it what it evokes from ourselves. It speaks for our wordless aspirations and dreams.

Ad Libitum

By 'Feste'

Not a doubt of it; the contemporary composer of what is known as the 'advanced' type is going through a bad spell. Why? Since the war he has had ample publicity. In this and other journals his cause has been put forward with a blend of enthusiasm and knowledge that was rarely if ever forthcoming in the case of composers of a generation ago. Certainly he has no cause to complain of want of space or sympathy on the part of the musical press. Publishers too have done their duty, issuing such a steady stream of new music that reviewers cannot keep pace with it. Public performers have been less encouraging, but then that is the way of public performers. Before blaming them let us remind ourselves that the strain of concert work, travelling, and (in many cases) of teaching leave a performer with little time and energy for the study of new works. When these new works make excessive demands in the way of technique, understanding, and (above all) of memorising, the performer has a reasonable excuse for fighting shy of most of them. The neglect of contemporary music on the part of orchestras is even more excusable. Composers who write music that calls for an extravagantly large force and a fantastic amount of rehearsal are merely knocking their heads against an economic brick wall. When people do that, it's never the wall that gets hurt—for the crux is the public, and there is no getting away from the fact that the public has shown unmistakably that it has little use for contemporary music of the extreme brand.

It is easy to say that the public has always shown a similar lack of interest and enterprise. No doubt a large proportion of it is mentally lazy, and prefers to go on enjoying familiar music rather than make an attempt to get on terms with the new. But there are plenty of us who have made a genuine effort to appreciate the present-day composer. If the result has been a disappointing reaction in favour of classical music—including a good deal that we thought we had done with years ago—the fault is not entirely ours.

It may be worth while to spend a few moments in trying to discover the reason for the lamentable waste of time, labour, and money that is now going on in connection with new music.

In The Times Literary Supplement a few weeks ago, Mr. Grant Richards was bemoaning the fact that so many books are now being published that many fine ones are simply lost in the crowd. Reviewers and readers alike cannot cope with the output. I believe the same may be said of new music. Far too much is being published, and the fittest gets little chance of surviving because it is smothered by the stacks of unfit. The fervid propagandists are to blame here. They have done so much vociferous hailing of geniuses and masterpieces that the public has become shy. You may cry 'Hats off! a genius,' too often, just as you may overdo the cry of 'Wolf!' (whether you refer to the animal or to Hugo). The need now is for a period—say five years—in which nothing new shall be published, the money and effort that are now being spent on publication being devoted instead to critical examination of the output of the past twenty years, and to steady and repeated performance of the pick of the basket. This is too much to hope for, of course. But a step in the right direction would be made if the Carnegie Trust temporarily stopped issuing new works, and instead subsidised at least three performances of the works they have already issued. After all, why should they not do for ———'s Symphony what they have done for Byrd's 'Great' Service?

But no propaganda or subsidising of performance can help music unless it has the power of attracting not merely the intelligentsia but the great mass of the musical public—a public that is larger to-day than ever it was. How does contemporary music stand in this regard? As a result of pretty extensive experience in reviewing and listening to it, no less in hearing the opinions of others who have given it a fair show, I have no hesitation in saying that the bulk of it fails on four grounds: (1) It is monotonous; (2) it is conventional; (3) it is unnecessarily difficult both for performer and hearer; and (4) it is ugly.

No doubt the modern composer would claim above all to have avoided monotony. He would point to his elaborate use of all sorts of novel instrumental effects; to his harmonic daring, his multitonality, atonality, 'juxtaposition of sonorities,' 'counterpoint of rhythms,' and the rest of the fashionable bag of tricks, as well as to his immense range of dynamic effects. On the face of it, this wealth of resource ought to make for variety and interest, but the hard fact remains that it does nothing of the sort unless it is used, first, in moderation, and, second, not merely for its own sake, but as an accessory to material of real interest and freshness. Can it be denied that in the greater proportion of new music the interest lies almost entirely in the manner and hardly ever in the matter? The apparatus of music is now so vast, and the technique of expression so easily acquired, that it is fatally easy for a young composer to turn out work so impressive to the eye that a Bach Suite or a Beethoven Symphony looks puerile in comparison. If music were a matter to be looked at, instead of listened to, the contemporary writer would win hands down. But the very features that make his scores so pretty to the eye are often those that produce monotony in the ear. We long for an occasional plain statement of something worth stating, and are given instead an elaborate and gorgeously-coloured exposition of the other sort of thing. If the composer would cut out half of his chromaticism and two-thirds of his notes, and re-score the result for small orchestra or string quartet, the result would be less monotonous. Too often, however, the removal of the spicy harmonies and unnecessary notes would leave a result too attenuated for any kind of medium. Perhaps something might be done in the shape of a duet for ocarinas. . . .

As to the second of the complaints made above, one can imagine the contemporary composer exclaiming, 'What! me conventional!' In reply one can only draw attention to the remarkable similarity that exists, not only between works of different composers, but also between works bearing widely different labels and programmes. I have lately been wading through a huge stack of pianoforte music by 'advanced' composers of various nationalities, and I am convinced that in the majority of cases one might safely change the titles and names of composers; only an occasional and very astute hearer would spot the deception. All alike strive so desperately to be original, and to avoid any suspicion of the obvious, that they have achieved a uniform state of the far-fetched—which is the worst type of conventionality. No doubt when Lyly began his affectations he and his admirers preened themselves on their daring and freshness. But in a few years the very title 'Euphues' stood for the worst and most artificial of conventions, and it has stood for it even till to-day. I am afraid that a very considerable proportion of the elaborate, clever, and self-conscious music being turned out to-day will a few years hence strike us in pretty much the same way. Indeed, we needn't wait in order to see signs of wear. Already they are showing. Take for example the fashionable Hucbaldisms and Byrdisms. I don't know how it strikes you, but I must confess to a weariness of the everlasting fifths, consecutive common chords in root position, false relations, and the rest of the easily manipulated material of the up-to-date primitives. I object to it not only because of its monotony, but also because of its cheapness. It requires nothing in the way of skill compared with the ordinary decent part-writing that is now despised. Time was when composers took a pride in good workmanship; now there seems to be a sort of fear of it, as if the technique of composition were incompatible with originality. As a result we have a race of young students and composers who are apparently anxious to avoid anything that would lead the public to suppose they had studied elsewhere than under one of our Hucbalds. Here, for example, is a quotation from an Opus 2, published a few weeks ago: and so on, with devastating effect for three pages. There are not two bars of decent part-writing in the whole affair. This piece is called 'The March Home.' Here are a few bars from 'The Moon'—an appropriate source:

Ex. 2.

This lunar inanity is solemnly repeated, and forms the core of the piece. The left hand deals in fifths throughout, save in about half a dozen places where an enterprising sixth occurs. I cannot resist the temptation to quote yet one more extract from this set of pieces:

Ex. 3.

The reader would never guess the title of the work from which this is taken; hence the value of labels. It is called a Minuet. Of course it might have been called by a score of other names, any one of which would have fitted it better. When an old composer wrote a dance, nobody could mistake it for anything but dance music, and they were even able to distinguish the minuets from the gavottes without seeing the title-page. But with this young hopeful's Minuets, Moons, and Marches, you have to look at the labels, and even then you wonder whether they haven't somehow got mixed in the wash.

Well, I may be a Philistine, but I see no sort of future for a school of composition so imitative as that of to-day. There is scarcely a composer with any resource left if you bar him from folk-song, the ancient modes, and the idiom of the Mediæval and Tudor composers. I am as enthusiastic as anybody over all these things—in fact, like a good many other musicians brought up largely on plainsong, I was using modal harmony as a matter of course, week in, week out, years before lots of these young composers had got into long trousers. And my adherence to folk-song is almost as long-lived. But we don't want these delightful things out of season as well as in. The fact is, a good many composers are badly overdoing the sham-antique, and in such a way as to suggest that certain idioms and progressions are a mere stop-gap and substitute for original thought.

A reader may say that I am making too much of the Opus 2 of some callow youth, and if the examples quoted above were very unusual he would be right. But they may be capped by progressions from almost every parcel of new music received for review. Thus, since the above was written, I have (without hunting for them) come across enough things of the kind to serve as illustrations to a good-sized primer on 'How Not to Compose.' Here is a sample from some Welsh dances. A four-bar phrase (presumably of folk-origin) is played by the left hand in single notes and repeated a fifth higher by the right hand; this is followed by a four-bar phrase in consecutive fifths, after which the opening phrase is played, also in consecutive fifths. Then another four-bar phrase is given out by the right hand in single notes, answered by the left in ditto. Then we go back on our tracks and repeat the sixteen bars with which we began. A couple of bare fifths round off this 'composition.' From start to finish we have nothing but single notes or bare fifths. The piece represents a couple of fairies dancing. After due thought you perceive that Fairy No. 1 does a hop round, followed by Fairy No. 2, after which the pair take a turn together. This is shown by the disposition of the parts, which (as you will have perceived) are limited to two—the exact number of fairies concerned. Subtle, isn't it? But where is the music? If you can find any in such futilities as this, you are easy to please:

Now the composer in this case is not a callow youth, but a fairly well-known composer and critic, and one of the leaders of the Welsh Nationalist party. The main objects of this party, so far as I understand them, are to free Welsh music from the malign influence of Anglicanism and Teutonism, in order that she may develop a school of her own. So little of the music composed by members of this Wales-for-the-Welsh party has come my way that I do not know how they are getting on with their scheme of self-isolation.

But if we may judge from this little specimen, they seem to have thrown off the German yoke only to put on that of France. This 'Fairies' Dance' merely suggests the feebler antics of the young French school, with a glance at the Stravinsky of 'Les Cinq Doigts.' If gallant little Wales thinks this is a good exchange, there is nothing more to be said. 'Tis her funeral. But the point that is of real interest to musicians generally is the fact that a composer of standing can bring himself to write, and (more wonderful still) can get published, a piece which from its very nature (consisting as it does of nothing but unisons and fifths) requires no skill in the composer or performer, and contains nothing of interest for the hearer. If this sort of thing is to be called 'composition' and 'music,' then any youngster at school can turn it out by the yard—in fact, the human agent is unnecessary. There must be plenty of mechanical contrivances that can be made to produce plates or pianola rolls of simple series of notes in single file, and duplicated at the interval of a fifth. The fifth-merchants no doubt think their reversion to primitive methods is 'progress.' But a lot of us cannot avoid the feeling that some of them write this way because it is a long sight less trouble than decent part-writing. Beerbohm Tree never hit a nail on the head more neatly than when, speaking of the daubs of some 'futurist' painters, he said, 'Futurism is the loin-cloth of the incompetent.' As with painting, so with music. Thematic development, good part-writing, modulation—all these and the rest of the composer's technical outfit, are to be acquired only at the cost of time and sweat, and no composer has ever done much without them. On the contrary, we know that several great men just failed to make the most of their gifts because of a lack of the technique of composition. Berlioz is perhaps the outstanding example. Even Schubert, heaven-born genius though he was, would wear better than he does to-day had he but schooled himself to develop themes rather than repeat them. And Beethoven himself realised rather late in the day that he still had a good deal to learn in regard to fugue and counterpoint. Those fugues that he indulged in during his last period—how much better they might have been had he gone through the mill more thoroughly in his young days! They would certainly have been shorter, and probably a good deal less dry. I believe the very word 'fugue' raises a pitying smile among the young bloods of to-day, yet there is no doubt that the writing of fugue is one of the very finest of studies. I agree that very few should be written for publication. But if all our composers under thirty years of age wrote at least one a week, preferably for string quartet, we should in a short time get rid of the muddled matter and untidy and pretentious manner that spoil so much of to-day's output.

Much of the monotony that we find in present-day music is the result of chromaticism. Given the choice between over-diatonic and over-chromatic music, the normal ear prefers the former. Spohr has long been under such a cloud that hardly anybody dare say a good word for him, but his chief defect—over-chromaticism—is also that of many of the living composers who despise him most. Yet the main difference between Spohr's harmonic method and that of —— (here you may fill in any one of a score of names) is merely one of fashion. Where Spohr over-used a diminished seventh, —— works a ninth to death. We object to Spohr's chromaticism not because it is chromatic, but because it is chromatic in an old-fashioned and over-expressive way. We find it cloying. Similarly, the next generation (even a good proportion of the present one) will object to the chromaticism of —— on the ground of its crudity. Not that crudity is its only fault. Much of it is as cloying as anything Spohr wrote. His diminished sevenths and minor ninths sound quite bracing after some contemporary strings of dominant ninths.

I spoke above of the exorbitant technical demands made by the modern composer. How many rehearsals were necessary for 'Pierrot Lunaire'? I forget the exact figure, but I remember that it suggested quite a decent cricket score. Such a matter is relative, of course. If the results are worth the trouble there is little cause for complaint. But a composer whose music demands about ten times the amount of preparation necessary for the accepted masterpieces has something to live up to. Is there anything like a proportionate result? In the case of the Schönberg work very few people thought the game was worth the candle. Moreover, it appeared that the hearer had to work almost as hard as the performers, so that even a costly series of rehearsals will not suffice: there must be repeated performances as well. Even then it is doubtful whether the normal human ear will ever be able to grasp more than a smallish proportion of the complexities. 'Pierrot' is an extreme case, it is true; but the same unpractical fault is shown by many composers of songs and short instrumental pieces. Thus, an advertisement of a series of English songs contains this sentence:

> We speak from personal experience with many of them when we say that after singing them for perhaps a hundred times one feels that one is only beginning to appreciate them, and is still finding new beauties.

Now, it is a test of good music that one is still finding new beauties at the hundredth performance. But I refuse to admit that it ought to be necessary to reach anything like that number in order to begin to appreciate its beauty. Among the finest songs of the great Lieder writers is there one that does not yield up a good deal of beauty at a first or second hearing? A composer who expects a singer to wait so long for the revelation is expecting too much—for it must be remembered that if it takes the singer all that time, the listener also is likely to be in the same fix. Whenever I hear so much about the necessity for hearing a piece of music over and over again, I am reminded of the man who introduced his brother—a rather dull chap—to Sam Johnson with the remark (I quote from memory), 'Sir, you will presently find my brother very entertaining.' 'Sir,' said Johnson, 'I can wait.' But these are less leisurely days, and, frankly, we can't wait. A composer who writes a song or anything else that means nothing to the hearer till it has been performed a few score of times must not complain if we suspect him of not knowing his job. A reader may remind me that many works by the great composers were not understood by contemporary hearers, and were even received with laughter. But I think it will be found that in all but a very few cases the works —e.g., the Ninth Symphony—were too long, or too noisy, or unusually discordant, rather than incomprehensible. Moreover, we are now discussing small forms, such as songs and pianoforte solos, and here I think there can be no doubt that practically all the output of the great composers has been understandable to the contemporary ear. The composer who writes unnecessarily difficult music is standing in his own light.

The ugliness of so much modern music is undeniable, even when we make due allowance for beauty being largely a matter of taste. After all, civilised people have arrived at a general agreement as to what is beautiful in physiology and nature, and all but a few eccentric folk think pretty much the same as to what is beautiful in speech-sounds and vocal tone. For example, nobody maintains that the corncrake has a beautiful voice and the nightingale an ugly one. It is conceivable, of course, that we should tire of everlasting nightingales, and we may desire an occasional touch of corncrake by way of relief. But what should we think of a man who wanted corncrake all the time, and looked round for his gun whenever a nightingale dared lift its voice in the neighbourhood? There are composers whose constant dissonance suggests the corncrake fancier. They like ugliness for its own sake.

No discord can be too violent if its point and relationship to its context are evident. The discord with which Beethoven starts the last part of the Ninth Symphony still strikes us as being a stoutish effort, but we may be sure that if Beethoven had been writing the work to-day he would have set down such a snorter that the existing chord would seem soothing. And nobody would complain, because the text demands something of the kind. But Beethoven would know better than to write a whole work made up of snorters; and that is just what Schönberg, Bartók, Schmitt, Stravinsky, Varese, Sorabji, and half-a-dozen others, appear not to know.

Next month I hope to be able to show by examples that a large proportion of the effect of modern music has little existence except on paper, and that the extreme technical demands often yield a result so small as to make the effort profitless both to performer and hearer.

P.S.—Some readers may contemplate writing and accusing me of attacking modern music on too slight an acquaintance. It may save them some trouble if I point out that for at least twelve years past I have in various ways been up to my neck in it. I began by thinking it was almost everything its admirers claimed for it; but the bulk of it has worn so badly, and yielded so slight a return for a lot of labour, that it has merely sent me back, with renewed appetite, to the older classics. If that were merely my own experience, it would not be worth writing about. But all sorts of signs show that it is the experience of a very large section of the musical public, and that is why I have tried to discuss the situation.

BRAHMS AND THE INFLUENCE OF JOACHIM

By Jeffrey Pulver

In spite of the popular belief that the contrary was the case, Brahms attained to European fame at a comparatively early age. It may possibly provide a romantic background for a biography to dwell at harrowing length upon a musician's 'early struggles' in order to bring out the brilliance of his later career in brighter light. That Brahms had to fight hard for a few years to combat the opposition of musico-political factions, cannot be denied; but the years of his battling against prejudice and ignorance were, in relation to the magnitude of his ultimate triumph, few in number. In some respects Schumann's enthusiastic prophecies regarding the future of Brahms were a hindrance rather than a help, in so far that the essay 'Neue Bahnen' gave the young composer a much higher standard of expectation to satisfy. Yet, in spite of the derision heaped upon him by some, as Schumann's newly-discovered musical Messiah, scarce fifteen years separated 'Neue Bahnen' from the German Requiem, and only a decade and a half intervened between the period at which the twenty-year-old accompanist of the violinist Edward Reményi first met Joachim and the year in which he was probably the most discussed musician in Europe. Now it is one thing to compose good music and quite another to make it known throughout the musical world; and of all the devoted friends who risked ridicule and opprobrium by espousing the cause of the young Hamburger, not one was so persistent or so successful as Joseph Joachim.

The circumstances attending the first meeting between Brahms and Joachim are sufficiently romantic. Into the political happenings that brought about the appearance of the violinist Edward Reményi at Hamburg there will be no need to go; suffice it to remember that at the middle of the 19th century he was playing in Brahms's birthplace, while there as a political refugee. Pianist and violinist were quickly attracted to each other, and a series of concerts arranged. Reményi, having met Joachim during his student-days at the Vienna Conservatoire, contrived that the short tour undertaken by him with Brahms should end at Hanover, so that he might renew his acquaintance with his old schoolfellow. The impression made by Brahms upon the director of the royal music at Hanover, both as pianist and as composer, was very deep, and is sufficiently well-known to enable us to pass it over with a bare mention. But from that moment onwards an intimacy was formed between the two men that lasted until the death of the younger in 1897. It was through Joachim that Brahms made the acquaintance of the Schumanns, and through him he was first made known to the greater public.

The friendship was only a few months old when Brahms asked Joachim for his first piece of advice—on the order in which his first published music should appear. In a letter dated in October, 1853, Joachim wrote:

> You ask me to tell you in what order you should let your music cry out to the world the fact of which you have long been joyfully conscious: I am! I am unspeakably touched by this. In the course of the summer (as you know), I had so accustomed myself to regard all I love most as lost to me that I had quite made up my mind to give you up to the Schumanns as a matter of course, because I realised that the grand, cloud-topped mountain must necessarily hide the hill, however friendly a shelter the latter may offer. . . . . It really seems to me immaterial (from the higher standpoint, and therefore from yours) with which of your works you first cry to the world: I am! A heavenly vision remains a heavenly vision, even if it begins by merely showing the world—its big toe.

But he gives a suggested sequence for the first seven works, and adds '&c., in infinitum.' In the following year the violinist again wrote (June 27, 1854): 'You dear, modest fellow, you ask me for criticism, and I can only tell you how much I have learnt.' Here the modesty was undoubtedly Joachim's, for he was the better-schooled musician. But the work in question was in the variation form, and in this Brahms, thanks to the teachings of his master Marxsen, stood pre-eminent. In July of the same year Joachim was again appealed to for advice on the re-modelling of the D minor Sonata for two pianofortes into a Symphony (it became later the Pianoforte Concerto, Op. 15), Brahms writing:

> I must just add that I want to let the low D predominate at the beginning, and that is why the F-B flat in the clarinets and bassoons is so weak. . . . . Will you encourage me to go on with the other movements? I feel so imbecile.

A most brilliant idea came to Brahms in the winter of 1855-56, and it must have been the subject of repeated discussion between the friends, for on February 26, 1856, he wrote to Joachim:

> And then I want to remind you of what we have so often spoken, and beg you to let us carry it out, namely, to send one another exercises in counterpoint. Each should send the other's work back every fortnight (in a week's time, therefore) with remarks and his own work, this to continue for a good long time, until we have both become really clever. . . . Why should not two sensible, earnest people like ourselves be able to teach one another far better than any Professor could? . . . . I am looking forward to the first batch. Let us take it seriously. It would be very pleasant and useful.

The plan was carried out, but Joachim, it must be confessed, soon became irregular in his performances. He had the work of his office to fulfil, and his procrastination and unpunctuality quickly brought a remonstrance from Brahms. A system of fining was instituted, the money derived to be spent on music and books. Needless to say, it was Brahms's library which profited to the greatest extent. In many other directions the actual help of Joachim is visible in his friend's work. My old teacher, Andreas Moser, said that he had examined the manuscript of Brahms's Concerto for pianoforte in D minor (in Joachim's possession) and found in it several corrections made by the violinist. In the same way the Pianoforte Quintet in F minor was given the form by which it is known to-day by the advice and help of Joachim. Brahms had intended this work originally to be a string quartet (with two violoncellos).

In making known the work of his friend, Joachim was the first in the field. A quarter of a century elapsed (until the C minor Symphony, Op. 68, was produced) before Hans von Bülow was sufficiently convinced of Brahms's qualities to embark upon the enthusiastic propaganda in favour of the composer that stands to his credit. But Joachim was a pioneer. Regardless of the invective hurled at him, and therefore not to be accused of having been impelled by any personal considerations, he persisted in performing and having performed the works of his friend. Indeed, he ran great risk of damaging his own reputation, for the Press as a rule misinterpreted his motives. When he played the Brahms Violin Concerto for the first time at Berlin, the papers printed the most violent of attacks upon his taste, and wondered why he should honour so terrible a work, and in addition make an orchestra of students (the Hochschule) accompany such 'rubbish.' When he produced Brahms's Serenade at Hanover, he received the following anonymous letter, dated March 5, 1860:

> Brahms's Serenade is a monstrosity, a caricature, a freak, which should never have been published, much less performed here; we say here, whilst the Pianoforte Concerto served up to us last winter still sticks in our throats! It is inexcusable that such filth should have been offered to a public thirsty for good music. . . . . May we be spared grimaces of this kind in the future! . . . . do not tax the patience of your audience too severely, and do not impose on them a taste for that which can only be the greatest torture to people with sound ears.

These two instances will be enough to show how things stood. The press-criticism and the anonymous scurrility were both contemptuously ignored, and Joachim continued to insinuate the work of his friend into the programmes of Germany. Certainly all the chamber music of Brahms and most of the orchestral compositions were first performed at Berlin by Joachim and the orchestra of the Hochschule; and the example set by the capital of Prussia was, in those days, followed by very many centres. That other cities were later in following the lead of Berlin and Hanover, may be traced to the absence of friends like Joachim or the lack of courage in those who were there, as much as to the 'New German' party and the Weimar-Bayreuth coterie.

No one, with the possible exceptions of Sir Charles Stanford and, through him, the Cambridge University Musical Society, and Sir George Grove, had so much to do with the popularisation of Brahms's music in England as Joachim. From the beginning to the end of Brahms's creative period he was indefatigable in introducing the work of his friend to London audiences. As late as 1892 (April 5), he wrote to Brahms that the houses were packed and that people had to be turned away; that the most tremendous enthusiasm prevailed, when the Joachim Quartet was advertised to perform compositions by Brahms. It is still common knowledge that to a certain school of musicians (or, better, supposed musicians) the works of Brahms offered opportunities for opposition to a manner of expression that was new to them, and which, when placed before them, they could not comprehend. But, in spite of this, and thanks to the few faithful believers in Brahms's genius, he made rapid strides in this country. Soon it became 'the thing' to confess to a love for his music, since it gave the ignorant the reputation for being in the same galley with the few who at first really saw the possibilities that still lay dormant in the blue-eyed, fair-haired, frequenter of the Vienna 'Rother Igel.' So much so that Joachim wrote to Ernst Rudorff on March 14, 1877:

> I have no time to tell you about the musical conditions in England. The most remarkable thing to my mind is the rapidity with which Brahms's works have become known, in a manner which far exceeded my expectations. Schumann made much slower progress here. Even the B major Quartet, which was treated so scornfully at Berlin, went down here.

It had always been Joachim's desire that Brahms should visit England. When writing to Clara Schumann from London (July, 1858) on the subject of the Crystal Palace, he added:

> But never in my life have I so much regretted that I was not an organist as in this wonderful temple of glass. To hear Johannes play there on one of the many beautiful organs, and particularly on the large one in the middle of the building, would be magnificent. Indeed, Johannes must make the acquaintance of London, it would suit him here.

He made another attempt to entice Brahms to England when he wrote to his friend respecting the offer of the honorary degree of Mus. Doc. by the University of Cambridge (from London, April, 1876):

> Prof. Macfarren . . . will have written to you on behalf of the Rector of the University to know whether you will accept the distinction of honorary Doctor of Music which they wish to confer on you. The University wishes to honour me in this manner also, and I have said 'Yes.' It is the first time the title of Doctor has ever been voluntarily offered to a foreigner. . . . It is a proof, at any rate, of how highly your things are thought of here, and indeed throughout the musical world in England. . . . The next question is whether you will really come to England so that you may be made a Doctor (a solemn ceremony at which the whole University is present). Without this you cannot be created Doctor.

Probably the thought of facing the 'whole University' with a speech was quite sufficient for the retiring and sensitive Johannes—he never set foot in England.

Exhibiting the greatest possible friendship in furthering his colleague's interests at home and abroad, Joachim was just as much concerned with securing an adequate post for Brahms when the opportunity presented itself. Without disparaging the many excellencies of Julius Stockhausen, he was bitterly disappointed when that musician received an offer of the post at Hamburg which he thought belonged by right to his friend. Writing to Avé-Lallemant on the subject (January 31, 1863), he said that 'the insult to Johannes will not be forgotten in the history of art—But, enough!' and that it was particularly sad to think that Brahms, with his child-like love for his native city, should have been passed over in favour of 'someone greatly inferior to him in talent and character.' In the same letter we find also the words: 'Simply as a man on whom one can rely I have the highest opinion of Johannes's capabilities and character.' It is quite likely that Joachim took the matter far more to heart than did Brahms himself; at any rate, the latter was on quite intimate terms with the singer. The two had met during the Rhine Festival of May 11-13, 1856, when Stockhausen sang 'Elijah.' An intimacy sprang up between them, and before the end of the month they had arranged to give two concerts together. The first took place on May 27, at Cologne, and the second on the 29th at Bonn. Brahms accompanied the singer, and between them they scored a veritable triumph. But the pianoforte solos of Brahms evoked little enthusiasm, and he had once more the vicarious pleasure of assisting in the triumph of another. The Hamburger never looked upon pianoforte playing as his vocation, and never played in public when he could earn sufficient for his needs in any other way. Moreover, at some periods, it required all the pursuasion of Clara Schumann and Joseph Joachim to encourage him to practise on the pianoforte at all.

In February, 1867, Avé-Lallemant, at Hamburg, received another letter from Joachim on the same subject as before, with a few very caustic remarks added:

> I suppose, judging by the Philharmonic's antecedents, it is no good hoping that you will arouse yourselves now and offer a fitting appointment to the greatest musician of our day (I know what I am saying)—to Johannes Brahms, of Hamburg. A certain amount of suffering and lack of appreciation seem to be essential to the development of great minds, and perhaps the Committee of the Philharmonic Society even consider it their duty to the Fatherland . . . to sacrifice themselves patriotically for the sake of Brahms's future.

It mattered not what was the nature of the service that Joachim could render Brahms; it mattered little at what inconvenience to himself—he was always ready to help. Although not so active in his endeavours to secure the publication of his friend's music as he was to introduce it by his own performances, he nevertheless did his best for Brahms even in this direction. On May 15, 1860, he wrote to the composer:

> Dr. Härtel is at Genoa; but I said what there was to say about your things to his brother, and I think he is prepared to print one of your Serenades. But he did say that he would like to print some smaller things at the same time. Can you not offer him some songs? He was not so amenable with regard to the Concerto. . . . I hope you will write to him soon.

It must not be supposed that Joachim's zeal on his friend's behalf was entirely due to blind admiration for Brahms. He was by no means indifferent to the composer's weaknesses; indeed, the obstinacy and sensitiveness of Brahms more than once strained their friendship to its limits. Brahms, according to Joachim's letter to Gisela von Arnim (October 20, 1854), was 'egoism incarnate, without himself being aware of it. He bubbles over in his cheery way with exuberant thoughtlessness.' Yet, in spite of all the grounds for complaint which he mentions in this letter, his love and esteem for the Hamburger never changed. No memory of Johannes Brahms should be dismissed from the mind before an appreciative thought for Joseph Joachim has formed, for Joachim was the high priest who preached the gospel of Schumann's 'musical Messiah.'

NEW LIGHT ON LATE TUDOR COMPOSERS

By W. H. Grattan Flood

VI.—John Thorne

In Morley's list of 'practicioners' in 1597, at the end of his well-known treatise, appears the name of Thorne as a Tudor composer of eminence, yet biographical details are lacking. Indeed, the only clue to his personal history is the eulogistic epitaph quoted by Francis Drake in his 'Eboracum,' in 1736, and reprinted by Sir John Hawkins in 1776, from which we get the date of his death as December 7, 1573. Yet even if no other detail has previously been published, Thorne's compositions which have survived bear ample testimony to the estimation in which he was held by his contemporaries. Hawkins had the discrimination to print one of his Motets, 'Stella coeli extirpavit,' which Dr. Ernest Walker, in his 'History of Music in England' (second edition, 1924), says 'has excellent qualities.'

From the inscription on his monument in York Minster it is evident that Thorne was not only a sound musician, 'most perfect in his art,' but was also a logician of eminence, as well as a man of attractive personality.

Mr. John E. West, in his 'Cathedral Organists' (1922), includes Thorne as Organist and Master of the Choristers of York Minster, and gives the date of his appointment tentatively as '1550.' He was certainly organist under Queen Mary, so that we are fairly safe in stating that his birth-date was c. 1520. No particulars have come down as to his master, but it is more than probable that he studied under Leonard Mason, who was organist and vicar-choral of York from 1520 to 1545.

Thorne was, no doubt, organist of York Minster from 1545 till his death. There is one incident in his career that has not been noticed by any previous musical historian—namely, that he suffered deprivation for his adherence to the old Faith. In the remarkable work entitled 'De Visibili Monarchia,' published in 1571 by Nicholas Saunders (Regius Professor of Canon Law at Oxford University), the seventh book gives a list of the English bishops and clergy that suffered for the Faith under Elizabeth, including Archbishop Heath, of York, who was Chancellor of the Kingdom under Queen Mary, and who died at Chobham, on December 8, 1578. Saunders also gives the following list of Chief Musicians who were deprived of their office: 'Magistri Musices, officio suo ob Primatus confessionem ejecti: Sebastianus, in Cathedrali Ecclesia Londoniensi; Thornus, in Metropoli Eboracensi; Prestonus, in oppido Vindelisorensi.'

Thus we learn that in 1560 John Thorne, chief musician in York Minster—as well as Sebastian Westcote, of St. Paul's, and Thomas Preston, of Windsor—suffered deprivation at the hands of the visitors. However, like Master Sebastian of St. Paul's, Master Thorne was apparently permitted to hold his post at York on account of his rare musical talent. He continued in office till his death, in 1573, and was buried, as Drake informs us, in the Minster, 'in the middle aisle, from the West door.' The inscription on his monument runs as follows:

> Here lyeth Thorne, musician most perfect in his art,
> In Logic's Lore who did excell; all vice who set apart;
> Whose Life and conversation did all men's Love allure,
> And now doth reign above the Skies in joys most firm and pure.
> Who dyed December 7, 1573.

In addition to the beautiful Motet, 'Stella coeli extirpavit,' for three voices, printed by Hawkins, there is an 'In Nomine' at Oxford, and an 'Exultabunt sancti,' for the organ, in the Redford MS. (Brit. Mus., Add. MSS. 29,996)—admirable specimens of Thorne's genius. It is of interest to add that the original MS. of the last-mentioned organ solo is in the handwriting of John Redford, while another composer represented is Thomas Preston, Organist and Master of the Choristers at Windsor, who was 'deprived' at the same time as Thorne, as quoted above from Saunders's book. It is also worthy of note that in the three-part 'Stella coeli,' till recently in Baldwin's MS. in Buckingham Palace Library (now on permanent loan to the British Museum), the composer is described as 'Mr. Thorne of York.' Nor must it be forgotten that three ballads by 'Master Thorne' are still preserved, one of which, 'O mortal man, behold and see,' is to be found in Redford's moral play of 'Wit and Wisdom,' the ballad being registered in 1563 by John Cherlewood. All three ballads will be found in Add. MSS. 15,233 in the British Museum.

STUDIES ON THE HORN

By W. F. H. Blandford

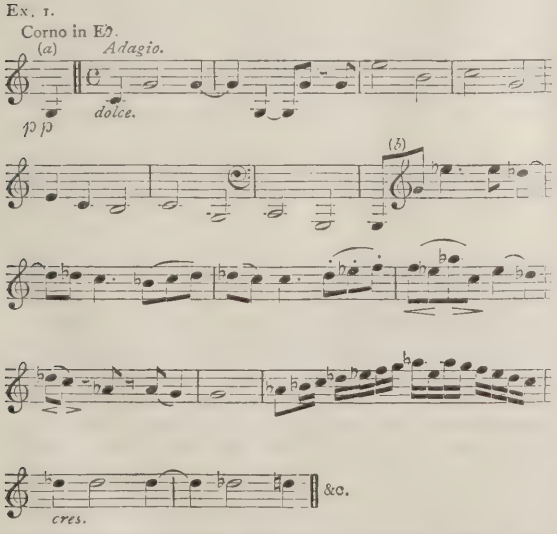
III.—The Fourth Horn in the 'Choral Symphony'*

Of all the instrumental parts contained in the nine Symphonies of Beethoven, none, it is safe to say, has aroused more comment, caused more speculation, or been the subject of more anxiety in performance than that given to the Fourth Horn in the Adagio of the 'Choral Symphony.'

The problems that it offers centre in the sixteen bars in common time that begin the third Adagio section at bar 83 of the movement; for although the part requires consideration as a whole and contains some other lesser difficulties, the remainder by itself would hardly have attracted much comment.

Here is the celebrated passage, familiar to all who have studied a score or an analytical programme of the work:

Ex. 1.



* Previous articles of this series appeared in the Musical Times—I., August, 1922, pp. 544-7; II., September, 1922, pp. 622-4, and October, 1922, pp. 693-7.

This is no case of doubtful or disputed readings, such as the second-horn entry in the first movement of the 'Eroica,' the redundant bars in the Scherzo of the Fifth Symphony, or the tempo of the Presto in the Ninth. Such variæ lectiones—there are a few minor ones—as are disclosed by a comparison of the published scores with the manuscript corrected and sent by Beethoven to the Philharmonic Society of London, now deposited on loan with the British Museum, do not affect the issues.

That, even a century after the first performance of the work, there are still questions awaiting an answer, will be made clear by the following anthology of extracts from the writings of musicians of varying degrees of eminence, selected without any attempt to make it exhaustive:

Grove, Sir G. (in reference to the first five bars of the section marked (b))—'Here, too is a melody, the speaking beauty of which is, if possible, increased by the peculiar tones of the horn—the fourth horn be it observed—which delivers it.

'In the course of this variation, the horn has again some difficult feats to accomplish [quotations omitted], but Beethoven has amply repaid this most human instrument for any such trials by the lovely part which he has given it in this Adagio. The fourth horn was in his good graces all through the movement.

'Note.—The fourth horn. In the present case the fourth horn may have been a friend to whom he wished to do a special favour.' ('Beethoven and his Nine Symphonies,' London, 1896, pp. 366-8.)

Hofmann, R.—Until recently it was understood that Beethoven only made use of the simple horn; but this cannot have been the case, for we find (1) the low G (not playable on the simple horn); (2) Beethoven never used long sequences of notes in a key with many sharps or flats as the signature. Oral tradition has it that, at the time of Beethoven, Levi, a fourth-horn player at Vienna, possessed a recently invented valve-horn; on the ground of this invention it was imagined that all horn passages could be played with equal tone-quality. Probably for this reason, Beethoven (who could scarcely have heard it himself in his greater and later works) wrote the difficult passage for the fourth horn in E♭. The whole part lies badly for the player, and in view of the tone there seems no doubt that the second half of the solo is better on an E horn.' ('Praktische Instrumentationslehre,' English translation, London, 1893.) (The translation slightly altered.)

Stanford, Sir C. V.—'In the slow movement the influence of his beloved horn predominated; the part was given, curiously enough, to a fourth-horn player, usually the inferior of the other three, and its difficulty (but not impossibility) suggests that the fourth hornist in the orchestra at Vienna was the best of the four.'—('Interludes,' London, 1922, p. 46.)

Weingartner, F.—'In any case it is strange that he should have entrusted this extremely difficult and carefully worked-out solo to the fourth horn. I admit that in the Kaim-orchestra at Munich I once had a fourth-horn player—Herr Stange—who gave this passage excellently, but he was certainly an exception. As a general rule it will be safer to assign the passage [beginning at (b) in the extract] to the third or first horn player according to their respective merit.' ('On the Performance of Beethoven's Symphonies,' Leipsic, London, &c., 1908, p. 169.)

From these and other observations may be deduced the following questions as still open to discussion and definite solution:

(1.) Is the part appropriately written for and capable of being played on the hand-horn or not?

(2.) Alternatively, is there any reason for supposing that Beethoven was influenced in writing it by, or intended it for, the then recently invented valve-horn?

(3.) Why is it assigned to the fourth horn rather than to one of the others, or why was the part not divided between two of the horn quartet?

(4.) Had Beethoven any special motive in writing it, such as the desire to oblige a particular performer, or the knowledge that it would be played by a specially skilled executant?

(5.) What difficulties does it present in performance on the two types of instrument, and how are they usually met?

It is the object of the present article to answer the questions as far as possible on the available evidence, or at least to narrow down the issues. In so doing, the course will be adopted of dealing, first with some features of the horn-player's practice, as it existed a century or more ago; secondly, with the application of these to the consideration of Beethoven's score; and lastly, with the problems of performance.

I.

It is a well-known fact, to which every text-book on instrumentation bears witness, that the compass of the horn is so great, extending to upwards of four octaves (this compass is actually covered by the extreme notes in compositions ranging from Bach's works to Verdi's 'Falstaff') that no single player can cover it, except as a tour de force. One occasionally meets with players with a range of as much as four octaves and four or five semitones, but this is more than can be used satisfactorily. In consequence, it became customary for performers to restrict themselves to one extremity, more or less, of the horn's compass, and thus they became classified as First or Second horn players, a distinction that in modern times has become generally ignored.

About, or shortly after, the date of production of the Ninth Symphony, the French player and teacher, Dauprat,* introduced the terms cor-alto and cor-basse to indicate more precisely the registers previously known as First and Second horn. Although they do not bear translation well, they are convenient to use, because 'first and second horn' are as indefinite as 'first and second voice' would be for indicating vocal compass. Both Handel and Bach wrote second horn parts, but neither knew the cor-basse, as witness Handel's Concerto for Strings and four F-horns, where the absence of any deep notes, when the horns are in four-part harmony, is only intelligible on the supposition that his players did not cultivate them.

The cor-basse seems to have been introduced by the Bohemian school of players, of whom little, except a number of names, is known before about 1760. It involved the use of a mouthpiece larger than that of the cor-alto, and with a bore tapering uniformly from end to end. This is the form of mouthpiece that is regularly figured in musical text-books and is now so rarely seen in use. With it was associated the embouchure (i.e., the mode of application of the mouthpiece to the lips), whereby most of the rim is placed on the upper lip and its lower margin is pressed into the mucous membrane of the lower lip. This embouchure, which differs considerably from that of the trumpet, is essential to the proper production of the deepest notes, and is now in general, though not universal, use amongst horn-players.

Mouthpiece and embouchure gave the cor-basse a softer, broader, and more mellow tone than was possible to the cor-alto player, and in consequence the cor-basse tone became the horn tone par excellence. When the distinctions between cor-alto and cor-basse were rigidly adhered to, the E♭ horn was considered the finest in tone-quality, and it was not until a register known as the cor-mixte, which confined itself to about one-and-a-half octaves in the middle of the instrument's compass, came into partial use about 1800, that the F-crook began to supplant the E♭ as the more popular crook on the instrument. To-day the cor-basse mouthpiece is rarely used, and the E♭ crook has entirely disappeared, even from military bands, where the silly custom of writing for it still persists, forcing the player to transpose nearly every part he meets with. This has led to a certain modification of horn tone, and, if one's recollection is to be trusted, the average horn-tone of to-day tends to be thinner, more incisive, and less velvety, and noticeably weaker on the low notes than the average tone of forty years ago—in other words, the cor-alto tone is inclined to predominate.

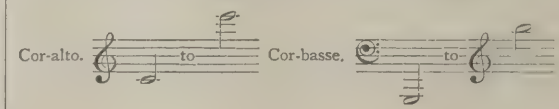
As a guide to the limits of the two registers (which were not rigidly fixed) we shall take Domnich's 'Méthode de Premier et de Second Cor' (Paris, 1808), partly because it was the best Method then extant, and partly because Domnich was the teacher of E. C. Lewy, the player to whom Hofmann presumably refers.

Domnich gives the compass of the cor-alto, in real sounds, as from  to  (or the nearest available notes on the crook in use), and that of the cor-basse as from the fifth semitone below the second harmonic to  (real sound).

This gives the former a compass of two octaves and three semitones, or thereabouts, and the latter a range that varies with the crook employed.

On the E♭ horn their respective compasses are:



These are Domnich's extreme limits, which he recommends composers to curtail by a note or two at the top if they wish to be sure of having their effects executed. In the medium the two registers overlap to a considerable extent, and therefore solos limited to the common portion could be given to either horn at discretion. Owing to the general superiority of the tone of the cor-basse, he was often made the soloist; and the fact of a solo being written in a score for the first horn does not necessarily indicate that it would not, if suitable, be played by a cor-basse. During the 19th century, true cor-alto parts fell much into desuetude except in the writings of German composers (Weber, Schumann, Wagner, &c.), and the position of principal horn was often filled by a cor-basse. The celebrated Punto himself was a cor-basse, though possibly, like many soloists, he did not limit himself to this register; but Beethoven's Sonata for horn, which was written for him, is strictly so confined, and is a typical example of cor-basse writing. It is even more surprising to find that, until the late 'sixties, the solos at the Paris Opéra were played by the second horn.* The last of these second-horn soloists, J. F. Rousselot (1803-80), retired in 1869. He was probably the hornist of that name who played fourth at the first performance in England of Beethoven's Mass in D.†

* Louis François Dauprat (1781-1868). 1st prize at Paris Conservatoire, 1798; 1st horn at Opéra and professor at Conservatoire; teacher of many famous players, including Paquis, the last distinguished hand-horn player resident in England. Dauprat was himself a cor-basse.

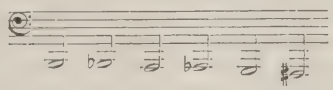
The cor-basse did not have it all his own way in solo work. There were always cor-alto soloists, and virtuosi who covered the entire compass of both registers. But he had an absolute monopoly of chamber music, when only a single horn was employed. For him were written the parts of Mozart's and Beethoven's Quintets for wind and pianoforte, the latter's Septet, Schubert's Octet, and other less familiar compositions. This monopoly was admitted even by Gallay,‡ Dauprat's successor at the Conservatoire, who, being himself a cor-alto, advocated this register for the soloist.

Valuable as the low notes of the horn were, when they furnished the only deep sounds on any wind instrument other than the bassoon, there were very few of them. In fact, the early cor-basse had only the 2nd and 3rd harmonics at his disposal below the compass of the cor-alto. This led to attempts to extend the limited scale of the instrument by means of what are called 'artificial' or 'factitious sounds' (sons factices), which are much older than hand-stopping. These are sounds which do not conform in pitch to any of the harmonic overtones of the air-column. They are more numerous than is generally supposed, and a proper knowledge of them is necessary to any critical study of early horn parts;§ nevertheless it would be outside our present purpose to give a full account of them and the phenomena of their production. By recourse to them, in conjunction with hand-stopping, the assiduous cor-basse managed painfully to give his instrument a complete chromatic scale throughout its compass. The more extravagant of these sounds are of very poor quality — mere groans—but they are to be found in music, particularly in the lowest parts of trios and quartets for horns alone. The most important artificial sounds are the five or six semitones below the 2nd harmonic:



they were generally written as a descending diatonic or chromatic scale, or else the low G was made use of by direct drop from the 2nd harmonic, as in the solo under discussion. They can be produced only in slow time, as their intonation has to be fixed more or less tentatively.

These five or six notes formed part of the resources of every cor-basse, even if he rejected (as Domnich does) many of the other impracticable sounds; examples of their use are to be found in Haydn, Weber, and elsewhere, and also in Beethoven's Sextet for strings and horns and his Sonata for horn. The low G is the best of these notes, and its quality may, with practice, be made to approach that of the true harmonics. As it is a sub-octave of the 3rd harmonic of the air-column, its merits may be due to reinforcement by overtones. Even on the valve-horn the artificial sounds are occasionally useful. A second horn, confronted with the long opening note (the low C for the B♭ bass horn) of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, with nothing but the inevitable F crook to play it on, must have recourse to them. Played as the low G on the F horn put into E♭ by the first piston, this note can be held steadily and with good effect.

It may be of interest to mention, what is not generally known, that on the high B♭ and A horns—on which the fundamental note can be easily obtained, in spite of text-books and the attempted application to the horn of Cavaillé-Coll's law—artificial sounds can be produced down to at least three semitones below the fundamental; and, on a shorter tube, such as an F or E♭ crook, used without the horn, to an octave below the fundamental. They obviously depend entirely on the power of causing the lips to vibrate sufficiently slowly, and not on the length of the air-column, the horn acting as a resonator, in the manner of a gramophone trumpet.

The help given to the cor-basse by artificial sounds was feeble, and the great impetus to its development was the invention of hand-stopping, by Hampel, himself a cor-basse. It may therefore be claimed for the cor-basse that his successive efforts—first, in modifying mouthpiece and embouchure, and secondly, in utilising the artificial and stopped sounds—and the resulting increase in refinement and expressive power, raised the horn to the artistic level at which Beethoven found it, and that, but for him, it would have stagnated, as the trumpet did, until the invention of the valve-system came to the rescue.

In addition to the low notes that were his exclusive property, the cor-basse was called on for executive feats that were not demanded from the cor-alto—or, at least, to anything like the same extent. One was that of making rapid skips over intervals of any extent up to two octaves and a fifth. These skips are very common in Beethoven's parts, and are often rendered necessary by the gaps in the second-horn scale, which prevent the required note from being taken in its proper octave. The second-horn part in the first two movements of this Symphony teems with them, and is proportionately fatiguing, however competent the executant may be to perform them.

Another feat was the rapid delivery of the arpeggio passages and flourishes on the common chord that went by the name of batteries du second cor. One or more of these was called for in practically every solo and important chamber music part of the late 18th century, after which their popularity waned.

As examples of cor-basse passages, the following are quoted: the first is taken from Beethoven's Quintet for pianoforte and wind (produced in 1797), and the remainder are from his Sextet for strings

‡ Jacques Francois Gallay (1795-). His studies are still much used, in spite of the fact that they are written only for the hand-horn and contain no low notes. An old Frenchman, who knew him, once said to the writer, 'Ah! Monsieur Gallay—il montait comme un ange, mais il ne pouvait pas descendre!' Paquis used to stigmatise him as a cornet-player on the horn.

§ C. Forsyth, 'Orchestration,' London, 1914, p. 80, states that the note and two horns (attributed by Thayer to 1794-95), which has been called 'unimportant.' In a sense it is so, but it is an enjoyable little work, always well received when efficiently played, and it is a nearly complete compendium of horn practice of its period. One is tempted to suppose that it was commissioned by two of the travelling virtuosi of that time, but no history of the kind has been attached to it. The extracts are all for the E♭ horn.

The first two extracts are examples of melodic passages involving the use of stopped notes :

Ex. 2. Andante cantabile. Quintet.

Ex. 3. Adagio. Sextet.

The stopped notes employed in the above are :

Ex. 4.

the black notes representing fully-stopped notes. The upper f was also sometimes fully stopped, and is so given by Domnich. One fails to understand why, as it is much better as a partly stopped note.

The next examples are a 'batterie' and an accompaniment figure involving extensive skips :

Ex. 5. Allegro con brio. Sextet.

Ex. 6. Allegro con brio.

The last is one of the most difficult figures ever written for the cor-basse, requiring great sureness of execution and exceptional control of respiration, as it must be taken in a single breath.

Until the 19th century no suggestion of inferiority attached to the cor-basse, to which class many of the then popular soloists belonged. His work was at least as responsible as that of his companion, who did not then jeopardise his command of the high notes by attempting low ones, and it often demanded more brilliancy of execution. Domnich tells us that a pupil should elect, from his first lesson, which register he would adopt. What would be the astonishment and indignation of a present-day student if he were invited to devote his entire professional life to playing second or fourth horn! But the name of 'second horn' was always detrimental, and Dauprat gives this as one of his reasons for proposing a change, alleging that it brought about offers of lower remuneration. This defect, however, has never yet been remedied.

THE GREATNESS OF BACH

By GEORGE GARDNER

The dramatic critic of The Times some time ago gave us a column on 'Jane Austen.' Speaking of the artistic unrest so often found in the present day, he said :

> War-weary and shell-shocked, we live in a hubbub of futurism and dadaism, cacophony miscalled music, wrangling-matches miscalled plays, and novels that are psycho-analytical tracts. Bruised and dizzy, we seek for a peaceful retreat, and just there, I think, we find the supreme value of Jane Austen for us in 1922. . . . Her novels are a refuge not only from the madding crowd's ignoble strife, but from the crude and criard work which is even more madding than the crowd.

Perhaps it is not to be expected that all readers of the Musical Times should share Mr. Walkley's enthusiasm for the work of Miss Austen, or that they should accept his sweeping condemnation of the developments of modern art. All the same, I feel that he thus suggests a point of view from which we do well to look upon the greatness of a musician like J. S. Bach. In the work of that astonishing genius many of us have discovered an influence that is alike steadying and soothing. Not merely does he lead us into an emotional region, entrancing by reason of its genial calm (that also is done by Mozart, and—may we not say?—by Miss Austen), but by the massiveness and the ordered strength of his writing he offers a welcome deliverance from whatever is pretentious and shrill in the artistic efforts of to-day.

Still, there is another side to the question which must not be overlooked. Certain keen amateurs of music, if they speak frankly, will say that to them much of Bach's work appears dull and old-fashioned. It is not that they crave for the sensational or the vulgar. To them, Wagner, Elgar, and other modern composers, with their up-to-date expressiveness, their use of ever-changing rhythm, and their magical dealing with orchestral colour, make a profound appeal. But the people of whom we are thinking feel bound to confess—perhaps rather shamefacedly—that in their view the compositions bearing Bach's name seem monotonous and over-lengthy; in short, only a curious product of bygone methods and ideas.

Now, it is always wiser to try to understand an opinion contrary to our own, than simply to condemn it. And we must admit that there are features in Bach's musical architectonics which demand, if not explanation, yet an effort at comprehension.

With regard to the spun-out character of such works as the two settings of the 'Passion' story—what we need is a mental attempt to get away from the craving of the present day for hurry and speed in ordinary affairs; and, in so-called literature, from the concentration demanded by magazines, short stories, and newspapers. We want to forget the agitating atmosphere produced by the motor-car, the aeroplane, the cinema; and, in music, by compressed statements of tragedy and violence, like the operas of 'Cavalleria' and 'Pagliacci.' We should try in thought to place ourselves amid the surroundings of some restful old German town, where all is grave and leisurely, where time is very far from being of the essence of the contract, as it is amid the rush of modern civilization. Then we begin to be receptive of a form of art which has value in the very way that it cuts across, and contradicts, our vain notion that whatever recent progress has produced is best and completest. In this connection, we should recognise that the omissions made in a big work like the 'St. Matthew' Passion place a stumbling-block in the way of many listeners. Could the entire oratorio be divided and sung on two different occasions, the composer's intentions would be made more comprehensible. As we usually hear it, the whole of the recitatives are given, while inevitable cuts have to be made in the arias and some of the choruses. The water, so to speak, of the recitatives is indeed clear and pure. But we are offered overmuch of it, in comparison with the wine of the measured and orchestrally accompanied portions. The balance of the work is disturbed, and the minds of those who are in the stage of tasting and trying are needlessly exercised.

Again, the existence of an overdose of elaboration must perhaps be admitted in certain of Bach's settings of words for solo voices. And this impression is intensified when we are distracted by the painful efforts which have to be made by some striving vocalist unaccustomed to the style of what is being sung. We ask ourselves anxiously, How can these prolonged runs be accomplished, which seem to demand an instrument more than a voice? Is it possible that the syncopations and the trying intervals can be satisfactorily achieved? Here, in such excessive embellishment of the vocal line, it may be owned that a spot at times appears upon our sun. On the other hand, it can be suggested that a necessary foil is thus provided for more expressive parts. A big work cannot satisfactorily be built up throughout at the same level of emotional intensity. There must be ups and downs, lights and shadows, which intensify each other.*

Another small matter may be noticed in connection with the Cantatas, which perhaps disturbs some of us. 'Pietism,' during and before Bach's time, had a marked influence upon the religious circles of Germany. This change of theological outlook meant, broadly, the substitution of sentimental feeling (which at any rate dallied with 'rationalism') for dogmatic forms of belief. How far this somewhat revolutionary change within the preserves of Lutheranism was wise or unwise, it is not for us now to discuss. Schweitzer says that Bach was 'sharply opposed' to the propaganda of Pietism; perhaps, primarily, because it set a ban upon elaboration in Church music. Anyhow, we see plainly that 'the smell of the fire,' so to speak, had passed on our composer and the librettists who worked with him. As happens sometimes, a man may in theory be definitely opposed to certain ideas by which he is surrounded. All the same he is subconsciously influenced and shaped by the mental and moral atmosphere wherein he is submerged. Hence we are treated at times, taking an example from 'My Spirit was in Heaviness,' to a sort of love-duet between the human soul and its Saviour. The words in their English translation run thus:

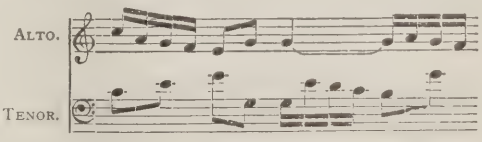
Lord Jesus, ... where art Thou gone?
Behold, O spirit, I am with thee.
Yea, ah, yea, I am rejected.
Nay, ah, nay, thou art elected.
Nay, ah, nay, Thou hatest me.
Yea, ah, yea, I care for thee.

For all the reverence and the restraint of the music to which such words are set, we cannot help feeling that the sentiments set forth are somewhat weak or even morbid. Here—as, for instance, in reading Milton—we have to make allowance for the changes in religious and other conceptions which are bound to evolve as the ages go by.

Perhaps it has been worth while thus to notice the difficulties which sometimes occur in the appreciation of Bach's music. That such hindrances are fairly widespread may be inferred from the perfunctory attention which his work often receives at festivals like those of the Three Choirs.

To describe the nobility and the strength of the greater part of Bach's writing would be like attempting to put into words the sweetness of an English springtide, or the grandeur of a mediæval cathedral. Nor need anything be said about the sense of unexhausted freshness with which we find ourselves able to return time after time to his greater works, in spite of familiarity with them; how they seem to fulfil the saying, 'Ever ancient, and yet ever new.' But about them there are one or two characteristic features which it may be well to mention.

Bach is amazing, and perhaps he stands alone in the completeness of his technical mastery of his art. His magical strokes resemble those of such painters as Rembrandt or Velasquez. In the matter of counterpoint, it is not merely that from time to time he does marvellous things in the way of bringing together contrasted themes, but look anywhere at his scores, and you constantly find that this wonder-worker has made almost all the voices and instruments, as you take them in pairs, move together in satisfactory two-part harmony. Here is an instance, selected almost at random, from the double chorus, 'Not on the Feast Day,' in the 'St. Matthew' Passion. This is what the first alto and the second tenor do:



There is a bar complete in itself, melodically and harmonically, while the other five or six voices also are moving in the same kind of ordered freedom. So constantly in the Cantatas, when Bach is writing in any number of parts up to ten, you can take, say, the different melodies given by an oboe and by the tenor voice. Place them together and you will find that in themselves they are, musically, as complete as they are congruous. Again, the spirit of unity that pervades the separate numbers of these works is an extraordinary feature of their architecture. You feel that they are teleologically conceived. They are like the predestined growth of a plant from some small seed. Additions are made by the way, in the shape of flowers and leaves. Yet those accretions are only part of the settled course of the whole organism from its beginning. Compare, let us say, the 'Hallelujah Chorus' from 'The Messiah' with the first chorus in 'O ewiges Feuer.' Handel's grand exclamation of praise is splendidly rhetorical, and it has a popular appeal which is of true value. Yet were it heard for the first time, its bold and clear-cut themes would hardly impress us with that sense of entire unification which is conveyed by the long, steady course of Bach's work just mentioned, or by the first chorus of the 'St. Matthew' Passion.*

Of course, it goes without saying that technical competency of this kind, even in its most amazing completeness, is only an instrument. Pursued for its own ends, nothing but a barren show of scholasticism would be attained. Yet, allied with gifts of imagination and expressiveness, this master-power of music building can produce immense results. As regards contrapuntal skill, how deplorably we miss anything of the kind in a writer like Berlioz, in other ways so finely endowed with enthusiasm and enterprise! Perhaps the lack of this competency is at the root of that discontent which we experience unwillingly, even when we are captivated by his brilliant cleverness. And what a difference self-discipline in this respect made to Wagner in the years that followed the writing of 'Lohengrin'! The masterly skill, on its technical side, with which 'Die Meistersinger' and 'Götterdämmerung' are put together forms an essential element in the untired delight with which we listen to these great operas. And the power of development, the knack of bringing a germ to fruition and completeness, is an outstanding feature in the building up of 'Tristan.'

Bach possessed in almost a unique degree this faculty of weaving together musical threads into a consummate fabric, perfect in the arrangement of its component forms and colours. Indeed, it is not too much to say that some of his efforts may be compared to the multitudinous splendour of a great tree in full foliage, wherein Nature, as has been finely said, is seen 'in the very act of labouring as a machine, while also she sleeps as a picture.' And in the 'Passions' music, the gigantic craftsmanship displayed seems to have a definitely instructive value. Here is narrated the sorrowful story of a human being hounded to a miserable death. And (if the numbers of the chorus are not too large) we see Him attended only by a few followers, pathetic in their helplessness; except for a moment when their courage flares up in 'Have lightnings and thunders?' There are touches of the 'pietism' we have considered, accentuating the human side of the whole tragedy. In telling contrast with all this, there stands out the immense calibre of the music, the almost infinite skill wrought into all its detail. And this grandeur and solemnity of the musical background brings an impression that the whole occurrence, as thus represented, means something deeper and vaster than what at first meets the eye or the ear. Insensibly we are led to feel, with one who stood by the Cross, 'Truly this Man was the Son of God.'

A little may be said about Bach's management of the orchestra in his Cantatas. We must remember that the selection of instruments at his disposal was curiously limited. This being so, we can see how monotony in an extended composition could best be avoided by keeping rigidly to the same combination of tones throughout each number of the work; rather than if there had been rung in every few bars all the changes possible with such scanty orchestral forces.

Yet the composer is always trying fresh experiments. To take only two instances. In the Ascensiontide Cantata, 'Lobet Gott,' the aria, 'Jesu, all Thy loving kindness,' is scored simply for flute and oboe, with a third part to be played by 'violini and viola.' An ethereal effect is thus produced, well in keeping with the mystical thoughts of the event described. There is a lovely aria for alto voice, almost in the style of a cradle song, which forms the second number in 'O Light Everlasting.' The accompaniments here are for two flutes and muted strings, with probably some soft support from the organ. The first flute plays the same notes as the first violins, an octave higher; the second flute and the second violins also go in octaves. The viola and the continuo (i.e., the double-bass and soft organ) supply the rest of the harmony. Here and there are variations of this tonal arrangement, and occasionally the organ alone appears. For the most part these accompaniments go on the same gracious course, leaving in the hearers an abiding sense of peace.

In modern music we have learned to expect a shimmering and ever-varied interplay of orchestral tones. Still, notwithstanding the innumerable combinations of sound now at the disposal of a modern writer for the orchestra, there is something to be said for a certain parsimony in the use of ever-changing colour, and for the policy of sticking to a beautiful disposition of tones, when it has been found. Weber and Wagner (in his early period) evidently were alive to the occasional value of this mode of procedure, and great examples of its use are to be found in Verdi's 'Requiem.'

It may be worth while here to consider an attack upon Bach's methods, made in a poem which is likely to retain a certain place in English literature. Robert Browning's 'Master Hugues of Saxe-Gotha' is avowedly a grotesque, and much of what it says is conditioned by the difficulty of providing double rhymes. Still, among other thoughts which will not soon be forgotten, there is in it a striking picture of man's outlook upon life. But, what is more to my present point, I feel sure that its author intends to picture what he looks upon as the futility and the barren scholasticism of Bach's Organ Fugues. The name 'Hugues' is obviously a good one for rhyming purposes. 'Saxe-Gotha' (with the 'h' elided) goes well with 'quota.' But that is not all. The word surely must have been chosen because the Duchy of Saxe-Gotha lies in the district of Thuringia, the traditional home of the Bach family, and near to places where John Sebastian was born, and where he worked for some years.

In the poem, Browning, in his uncouth way, seems plainly to be describing a particular Fugue of Bach's—the one in five parts written in the key of F minor. As the poet listens, his impatience bursts out:

> So your fugue broadens and thickens,
> Greatens and deepens and lengthens,
> Till we exclaim, 'But where's music, the dickens?'

* Cf. what is said by Mr. Fuller-Maitland about 'a kind of inconsequence in the melodic invention' which characterises some of Handel's songs ('Oxford History of Music,' iv., p. 99f.).

And, as he faces the whole towering structure, he sees in it little more than a warning against the vanity and uselessness of human effort. It is to him but a parable of how we mortals, 'in our impotent strife,' lose hold upon realities of beauty and goodness :

> Nothings grow something which quietly closes
> Heaven's earnest eye ; not a glimpse of the far land
> Gets through our comments and glozes.

Then comes a strange conclusion. Browning makes his weary organist desire to have done with the whole business of zigzagging counterpoint. 'Let us now have something straightforward and intelligible' :

> Say the word, straight I unstop the Full-organ,
> Blare out the mode Palestrina.

We need not make too much of a howler like this. It is not necessary to deny that chunks of harmony for performance on a big organ were written by Palestrina. The name came in conveniently as rhyming with 'arena.' That is the sole reason for bringing in here one who was as elaborate a contrapuntist as Bach.

What is wrong, is the whole assumption that the fugue-form is outworn and meaningless. Recently I looked through the sentimental and high-flown 'Proceedings' of the long ago defunct Browning Society. At one of its meetings, held in 1888, 'Master Hugues of Saxe-Gotha' was discussed, and the chairman delivered himself thus :

> It was a misfortune that the fugue-form was so much used by the ancient classical masters. To a great extent it had been abandoned by the latest masters . . . . Wagner had only once used the fugue, and that was in describing a street row.

Here, I submit is pure ignorance and prejudice. Why should the fugal methods of producing continuity in a long work be considered more forced and pedantic than the use of the 'first-movement' form, or the 'variations' form, or the set periods and repetitions found in dance music? Of course, the fugue in unworthy hands can become artistically as uninteresting as the binomial theorem. But when Bach transfuses it with vitality and enthusiasm, then we have one of the simplest and most effective methods of drawing together the threads of an extended musical fabric. I venture to quote in this connection what a great Dean of St. Paul's, R. W. Church, said about Dante's 'Divina Commedia.' He compared it to the kind of musical composition which > . . . alone seems capable of adequately expressing, in a limited time, a course of unfolding and change, in an idea, a career, a life, a society—where one great thought predominates, recurs, gives colour and meaning, and forms the unity of the whole, yet passes through many changes and transitions ; is at one time definite, at another suggestive and mysterious ; incorporating and giving free place and play to airs and melodies even of an alien cast ; striking off abruptly from its expected road, but without ever losing itself, without breaking its true continuity, or failing of its completeness.

Might not this have been written after the Dean had heard one of Bach's Fugues played by Stainer? And is it not vastly more to the point than Browning's misused cleverness?

There are various ways in which we can regard the greater examples of organ fugue left us by Bach. They are like a gorgeous piece of tapestry woven out of echoing sounds, with a distinctive pattern running throughout, bringing unity into the whole web of music. Or, I have sometimes felt in listening to them, that the story of a hero's progress is being unfolded. We are shown, as it were from within the man's soul, the adversities and sorrows through which he has to fight his way on to that final peace expressed only in the last chord. And always there is the sense of our being face to face with an organism—something pervaded by the life-force, with its constant urge to the development of higher and richer forms. Nietzsche's words—'Behold,' said life, 'I am that which must ever surmount itself'—might stand as a motto for some of Bach's Fugues.

No doubt it must be conceded that to some extent Bach addresses us in the musical language of two centuries ago. But we ought to be capable of making allowance for differences of idiom between his time and our own. That secured, we then find with ever-renewed delight how, in his old-world speech, he is setting forth ideas of beauty and order, of grandeur and gentleness, which are the unfailing and the perennial comfort of human hearts. His work thus seems to be as young as the flowers and the birds of each recurring year.

Finally, some of us feel that this quiet, self-contained musician was more than a builder of fair musical structures, consummate in their massive symmetry. He also is an exponent of the very quintessence of religious emotion. The worship of One Who is unseen and eternal, and the abiding excellence of human goodness, are what he is ever striving to express in his sacred works. Such utterances as his lift us far above all social and sectarian differences. Like Dante in the 'Paradiso,' Bach teaches us that love, whether of God or of man, is the supreme and abiding glory of our universe.

GALLI-CURCI : AN APPRECIATION

By Basil Maine

It is now nearly possible to write of 'The Galli-Curci Question,' so divergent have been the official opinions of this singer's powers. 'Divergent' is perhaps not the word ; 'qualified' is better. You will hardly find a notice of her first two London concerts which is not of the pendulum kind : 'On the other hand' ; 'In spite of this, Madame Galli-Curci could hardly be said to . . .' ; 'Not that this is any serious objection, in view of the fact . . .,' &c., &c. You know the kind of criticism which leaves your confusion worse confounded. There was good reason, I think, for this attitude. English critics are notoriously averse from the kind of fanfare heralding which is inseparably associated with the movements of cinema-stars. Madame Galli-Curci—or, rather, her agents—misjudged the English musical public, and especially the hypercritical section of it, in imagining that it would like her voice the better for knowing her favourite flower and particulars as to her diet and dress. The critics—almost to a man—were revolted by this shamelessness. It was for them like reading Graham Wallas's 'Human Nature in Politics' over again. Little wonder, then, that they came to the Albert Hall with their faces set against this new phenomenon. Little wonder that they—all unconsciously and quite honestly—diluted its wonder with the watered memories of Patti and Tetrazzini, and fixed upon the little imperfections which sprang from the nervousness of these overwhelming occasions, and magnified them without a relative thought. I say thus much to mitigate their cause, and because I am anxious to understand and excuse their attitude, however greatly they may resent the apparent condescension.

For most surely they were sadly in error to deny the greatness of Galli-Curci. We live in an age when singers are appraised for their intelligence, their charm, their power of interpretation, their magnetism, even for their platform habits. Vocal criticism is almost entirely occupied with irrelevancy. And what is it that is relevant in judging the art of singing? Would you be very much surprised to learn that the answer to this question is 'Voice'? We would not speak of a violinist's 'complete understanding of the composer's message,' if his strings were of jute, and his bow a rod of iron, nor of a pianist's 'affinity,' if the keys of the pianoforte firmly resisted his nimble touch. Yet, it has become almost a custom to criticise singers in this absurd way, for what is the voice but the instrument upon which the singer plays? The analogy is not weakened, but strengthened by the fact that the singer's instrument is part of himself, for is it not the ultimate aim of the violinist and pianist to enclose his instrument as part and counterpart of his own body and spirit? At least we think in such a way of Kreisler, Heifetz, Pachmann, and a few others. So then the first principle of vocal criticism is this simply: 'Of what quality is the voice?'

Apply this to Galli-Curci, and I fail to see how there can be any gainsaying. Her voice is as humanly perfect an endowment as can be freely imagined. Not only is it clear, smooth, and wondrous sweet, but it retains these beauties throughout its extensive range, so that every uttered note is like a winged circle of sound. Its volume is modest, which is not surprising, seeing how slight is the physique upholding it (perhaps even slighter than Patti's in her earlier days), and it is a one-colour voice, which explains to me the faithfulness of its reproduction on the gramophone, as well as the ease of its coloratura feats. At the top of the register—just round about A flat, A, and B flat—there is a curious insecurity, as if in the otherwise even floor of the voice there were just one loose plank. Nearly always Madame Galli-Curci can move so lightly over this plank that nobody would be aware of its existence, but during the hurdled course of 'Lo, here the gentle lark,' I felt it give ever so little. But there is this small area of danger in every voice, and its effective covering is a matter of slow and skilful achievement.

And of the production of this rare voice—the playing upon the instrument—what can be said? You must grant me full freedom here, and I will say that it is the most remarkable production I have ever heard. All the difficulties which beset the path of the very good second-class singer, the difficulties of 'placing' the voice—the cause of most of the self-consciousness which we gladly suffer in concert-halls—all these things have been so long forgotten by Galli-Curci that they have passed into the under-world of good habit. The violinist must again be called for illumination; just as he by instinct knows his finger positions, and which are best for this passage and which for another, so intimately does Galli-Curci know her voice-positions. Unconsciously her head has become a sound-box marked out clearly as any tennis court, and ready for 'service.' For the rapid staccato of her Spanish songs she plays well forward; for the legato of 'Chant Hindu' she stays quietly in the midway. (How finely wrought was the phrasing of this hackneyed song! How still and deep the stream of tone!)

There remains this to be said: Galli-Curci is not a Lieder-singer by election. The Schumann songs in her programme were of all the least satisfactory. Her manner is too restrained, her voice too serene and aloof to translate the warmth and reminiscence of such conceptions. Yet even here she will surprise on occasions, as, for instance, with her singing of Grieg's 'Waldwanderung'—a quick moment of breathless simplicity. But it is while singing the difficult and despised arias of Bellini, Donizetti, and Meyerbeer that she 'puts herself into the trick of singularity,' and is pre-eminent.

THE MACCRIMMONS OF SKYE

By R. C. B. GARDNER

It is doubtful whether there can be found in the whole world of music more remarkable instances of hereditary musical talent than are recorded in the histories of some of the great Highland clans.

Until the Heritable Jurisdiction Abolition Act was passed in 1747—an Act which abolished clanship, and made it an offence against the civil law for a chief to possess a retinue—each chief owned his piper, who, occupying a high position in the household, was treated rather as a gentleman than as a servant.

In several clans the office of piper was an hereditary one, the succession passing from father to son through several generations; but the MacCrimmons, pipers to the MacLeods of Dunvegan from 1500 to 1795, stand out above all other hereditary piping families by reason of the great merit of their compositions, and because they founded near Boreraig, in Skye, a school of piping to which pipers from all over Scotland were sent for tuition. This school was attended by the hereditary pipers of other clans—the Macarthurs and Macintyres, pipers to the MacDonalds of the Isles and Menzies of Menzies respectively, famous as they were, owed their skill to the MacCrimmon teaching, and although the school has been dead for nearly a hundred and fifty years, its influence may still be said to be felt in pipe-music, and there are pipers to-day who received their tuition from the last of the MacCrimmons through only three intervening generations.

It is necessary, however, at this point to describe the particular branch of pipe-music that is referred to in this article, lest it be thought that the MacCrimmons were merely players of everyday march and dance.

Leaving out such controversial matter as the perfection or otherwise of the scale of the Great Highland bagpipe, it can safely be claimed that pipe-music is worthy of more attention on the part of music-lovers, especially those who are interested in primitive and folk-music, than it has yet received. It may not be realised by Englishmen who know the pipes only from hearing the bands of Highland regiments, and from the occasional appearance of boy and girl pipers on the music-hall stage, that pipe-music is divided into three entirely separate classes, as distinct from each other as are jazz-music, folk-song, and sonata.

First there is Ceol beag, or 'little music'—which comprises marches, strathspeys, and reels. This is almost the only pipe-music heard in England, and although its performance demands quick and accurate fingering, it is not of a very high order in comparison with the other classes.

Secondly, there is Ceol meadhonach, or 'middle music,' consisting of old Highland folk-songs, lullabies, laments, croons, and slow marches—a very old form of pipe-music. It is possible that many of these tunes owe their origin to the clarsach, or harp, which in mediæval times was doubtless in greater evidence than the Piob mhor, or Great Pipe.

Thirdly—and this is the class of music the MacCrimmons taught and played—there is Ceol Mor, or 'big music,' the classical music of the pipes, comprising salute, gathering and laments, and tunes composed in memory of some battle or event in the history of a clan. Another name for this class of music is Piobaireachd, a word which was anglicised by Sir Walter Scott to Pibroch.

There are known to us to-day at least two hundred and fifty of these compositions, many of them dating undoubtedly from the 15th century, and a large number of similar examples are the work of one or other of the MacCrimmons.

A Pibroch is vastly different in form from a tune in little or middle music. It can best be described as a theme with variations. Upon the urlar, or groundwork, are built up two or more simple variations, which are succeeded by more intricate variations, known as the Taorluath and Crunluadh, each of which, in some pibrochs, has further variations of its own known as breabach, fosgailte, and a mach, the last-named being the quickest. The playing through of a pibroch may take twenty minutes or more, only four or five of which will be occupied by the groundwork or theme. The piece ends with the repetition of the theme immediately after the last variation.

Many of these pibrochs, particularly those composed by the MacCrimmons, are of extreme beauty and pathos, while those which have come down to us without name of composer or date, but which we have reason to believe were played by the MacCrimmons in the 17th century, bear the mark of great antiquity, and of having been composed by a people living closely in touch with nature.

The origin of the MacCrimmon family is obscure. The first of them of whom we hear—and that not much—is Finlay a' Bhreacain, or Finlay of the Plaid, who lived about 1570. His son, Iain Odhar, or Sallow John, became piper to MacLeod of Dunvegan about the year 1600, but no pibrochs can be definitely assigned to him. He was succeeded by his son, Donald Mor MacCrimmon, who composed a number of pibrochs of great merit between 1603 and about 1640.

Donald Mor's son, Patrick Mor, came next in succession. He was piper to the famous Sir Rory Mor MacLeod, and composed a Lament on the death of this chief in 1628. Tradition says that seven of Patrick Mor's eight sons died within twelve months, and that he composed, as lament for them, the beautiful 'Lament for the Children.' To him is also assigned the pibroch 'Fhuair mi pog 'o laimh mo Righ' ('I got a kiss of the King's Hand'), the occasion being a visit of King Charles II. to Stirling in 1651, although the following account of the incident from the Wardlaw MS. (Scottish History Society, vol. 47) would point to a John MacCrimmon being the piper honoured:

> There was great competition betvixt the trumpets in the army: . . . The next was anent the pipers, but the Earle of Sutherland's domestick carried it of all the camp, for non contended with him. All the pipers in the army gave John Macgurmen the van, and acknowledged him for their patron the chiefe. It was pretty in a morning (the King) in parad viewing the regiments and bragads. He saw no less than eighty pipers in a crould bareheaded, and John Macgurmen in the midle covered. He asked What society that was? It was told his Majesty: Sir, yow are our King, and yonder old man in the midle is the Prince of Pipers. He cald him by name, and comeinge to the Kinge, kneeling, his Majesty reacht him his hand to kiss: and instantly played an extemporarian part 'Fuoris Pooge i spoge i Rhi' ('I got a kiss of the King's Hand'), of which he and they were all vain.'

Patrick Mor was succeeded by his only surviving son, Patrick Og—i.e., Small, or young, Patrick—who was famous as a composer, player, and teacher, and who numbered among his pupils a very celebrated piper, John Dall Mackay, piper to Gairloch. During his lifetime, the school of piping was in full swing. He was married twice, and had a family of twenty, only three of whom survived to years of maturity. One son was Malcolm, but not much was known of him. He figures in an indenture in 1743, made between Lord Lovat and one of the latter's pipers, David Fraser, as being in charge of the piping school to which Fraser was being sent, 'in order to have him perfected a Highland Pyper by the famous Malcolm McGrimon, whom his Lordship is to reward for educating the said David Fraser.'

Patrick Og's second son, John, we know little about. His other son, however, Donald Ban MacCrimmon, is perhaps the best known of all the family, by reason of his having composed the beautiful 'MacCrimmon's Lament.' He left Dunvegan with his chief in 1745, and as they set out he was ordered to play the MacLeod's March, but Donald Ban felt a presentiment that he would never again see his beloved Skye, and he played instead the air which is now called 'Cha till mi tuille' ('I shall never return'). As prophesied by him, he did not return, for he was killed in the Rout of Moy. The Gaelic song, 'MacCrimmon's Lament,' is founded on the groundwork of the pibroch composed by Donald Ban as he was leaving Skye.

The next hereditary piper was Iain Dubh, son of Malcolm. Born in 1731, he remained as piper to MacLeod till 1795, and died in 1822.

He decided, some years before his death, to go to America, and got as far as Gourock, but could not bear to leave Scotland, so he returned to Skye. When he became too old and infirm to play the pipes, he would sit outside his house by the hour, fingering the notes on his walking-stick. He is said to have been the last of the family to hold the position of hereditary piper at Dunvegan, for although he had a brother, Donald Ruadh, little or nothing is known of him, and the final history of this remarkable family is almost as obscure as its origin. It is possible they emigrated to America, for it is almost certain there are now no MacCrimmons in Scotland who can trace their descent from the hereditary pipers of Dunvegan.

As to the school of piping founded by the MacCrimmons, its story is not less interesting than that of the family which made it so famous.

The sentiment expressed by Neil Munro in his fascinating story 'The Lost Pibroch'—'to the make of a piper go seven years of his own learning and seven generations before . . . . At the end of his seven years one born to it will stand at the start of knowledge'—might well be the motto of the MacCrimmon family. The course of tuition at their College lasted seven years. The learner was at first taught fingering on the feadan, or practice chanter, silently, without blowing the latter. Then followed a period when he was allowed to blow the chanter, but he was not allowed to touch the Great Pipes until he had become thoroughly proficient on the practice instrument. The course was rigorous, and it was a long time before a pupil was allowed the privilege of playing before MacCrimmon himself. Occasionally the course lasted twelve years.

The exact site of the school is not known, but it must have been close to Boreraig, a farm about eight miles south-west of Dunvegan Castle. In the vicinity of this farm, certain caves and hillocks bear to this day names which indicate that they were the places where the pupils practised the chanter, small pipe, and great pipe. The teachers used often to play in a large cave which is still known as the Pipers' Cave.

They held this farm rent free until 1747, when hereditary pipers either had to pay rent for their land, or were dispossessed of it. The MacCrimmons refused to pay rent, and broke up the College.

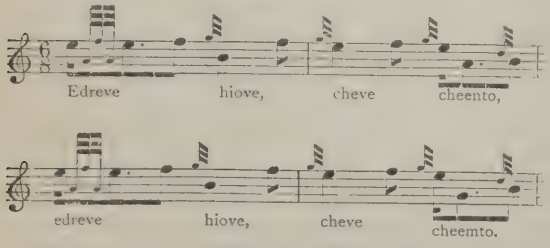
It must be explained that in those days there was no written musical notation for pipe-music, which was taught orally, and passed down from father to son. It is a remarkable thing that we should therefore be in possession of so many ancient pibrochs, especially as the Acts of 1747, in abolishing hereditary pipers and proscribing the pipes, dealt a blow at piping from which it recovered only with great difficulty when the Disarming Act was removed in 1782. These pibrochs were saved for later generations only through the medium of that peculiar system of language signs denoting pipe-music which is one of the strangest systems of musical notation ever recorded.

It was known as Canntaireachd, and it can best be illustrated by the following, which is the notation for the theme of the pibroch 'MacCrimmon's Lament':

Edreve hiove cheve cheento
Edreve hiove cheeve cheemto
Edreve hiode trae haento
Edreve hiove cheeve cheemto
Edreve hiode trae haemto
Edreve hiode trae haento
Edreve hiove cheve cheemto
Edreve hiode trae haento.

Fixed sounds in the shape of syllables would represent certain definite combinations of musical notes. The pupil, knowing what notes to play for each group of syllables, would be able to commit a tune to memory by learning the succession of these words in Canntaireachd.

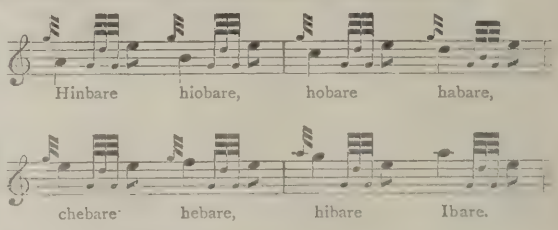
Thus, learning the above words by heart, he would play the first two lines as follows:



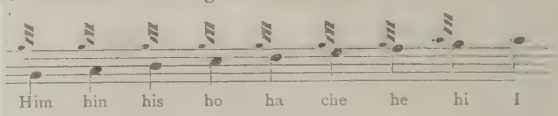
for he would know that each word denoted its own particular combination of musical notes.

The following shows a scale in the Taorluath movement or variation:

while a scale in the Leumluath movement is:



from which it will be seen that the individual crotchets with a G grace note are:



and so on.

Fortunately for later generations of pipers, this system was written down—at what date is unknown—and in 1828, Capt. MacLeod of Gesto published a book in which a number of pibrochs were printed in this notation. He also included in the book a number of airs which he took down from John MacCrimmon, who dictated them just as they had been taught at the Boreraig school. Bagpipe music is now written and printed in ordinary staff notation, but it is not unusual to hear pipers to-day humming over a tune somewhat as follows: 'Hiririn hiririn hananin hechin, embari imbari hodrochin hachin.'

Much has been written about this curious notation, which was brought to perfection by the MacCrimmons. Space will not allow of any further description of it here, nor is there room for mention of the many legends and traditions which have woven themselves round the MacCrimmons and their pibrochs.

Although, as has been stated, there were other hereditary pipers and many other famous composers of pipe-music, the musical compositions of the MacCrimmons are, as a collection, unique, for each and every one of their pibrochs is a masterpiece.

There is not known to us a MacCrimmon tune which falls below the highest standard, though the same cannot be said of all other composers. They would perpetuate no second-rate pibrochs, and they would labour many months at composing a tune until they had made it perfect. It was undoubtedly this meticulous care to give the world of piping nothing but their very best, that has made the fame of this family and has entitled it to a place among the first rank of the world's greatest composers.

Though unrecorded in Grove's 'Dictionary,' and without a place in the 'Dictionary of National Biography,' that Valhalla of Britain's famous, the tradition and fame of the MacCrimmons will endure as long as there are pipers left to shoulder the drones of the Piob Mhor.

Occasional Notes

In his latest novel, 'The White Monkey,' Mr. Galsworthy pokes fun at the more modern developments in poetry, painting, and music. Although a whole chapter is devoted to music—a description of a concert at (presumably) Queen's Hall—one cannot but feel that Mr. Galsworthy is on more secure ground with the other arts. No doubt musicians among his readers will set to work identifying the composers—Hugo Solstis ('an Englishman of Russo-Dutch extraction'), Baff, Birdigal, MacLewis, and Clorane, lumped together as 'English restoration composers'—though it is likely that the author has no intention of suggesting real persons. (Still, Hugo Solstis and Baff seem too obvious to be accidental.) There can be little doubt, however, as to the identity of 'L. S. D., the greater dramatist. . . . He looked rather frightening, his hair stood up so straight.' And we have an idea as to 'Woomans, the conductor, launched towards his orchestra':

> 'Look at him,' said Michael; 'guy hung out of an Italian window, legs and arms all stuffed and flying.'

We seem to know those arms and legs!

The singer at this concert was 'Charles Powls. How stout and efficient he looked, dragging little Birdigal to the piano'—an unusual procedure when giving a first performance of songs accompanied by the composer. The description of the songs suggests that 'Birdigal' is ——. But here any one of our really 'advanced' song writers will fill the bill.

> The stout, efficient man began to sing. How different from the accompaniment! The song hit every note just off the solar plexus. . . . Birdigal must have written it in horror of some one calling it 'vocal.' Vocal! Fleur knew how catching the word was; it would run like a measle round the ring, and Birdigal would be no more! Poor Birdigal!

[Both Michael and Fleur, being in the 'ring' turned up dutifully at such concerts, but both secretly liked a 'tune,' and a rhythm that could be danced to.]

> Three songs! Powls was wonderful—so loyal! Never one note hit so that it rang out like music!

All the same, we think that Mr. Galsworthy meant to suggest that the voice-part and the accompaniment were of the fashionable misfit type; instead, he gives an impression that Mr. Powls's 'efficiency' was not enough to enable him to sing in tune.

> Birdigal was bowing, Michael saying: 'Come out for a whiff! The next thing's a dud!' Oh! ah! Beethoven. Poor old Beethoven! So out of date—one did rather enjoy him!

The best bit of description is in the few lines devoted to the interval:

> The corridor, and refectory beyond, were swarming with the restoration movement. Young men and women with faces and heads of lively and distorted character, were exchanging the word 'interesting.' Men of more massive type, resembling sedentary matadors, blocked all circulation.

'Sedentary matadors' is good, and readers who try to 'circulate' at Queen's Hall during the interval will have no difficulty in attaching the label to a dozen or so of habitués.

Mr. Galsworthy is considerably off the mark when, later in the book, he says, through Michael:

> D'you know, only a hundred and fifty thousand people in this country have ever heard a Beethoven Symphony? How many, do you suppose, think old B. a back number? Five thousand, perhaps, out of forty-two millions. How's that for Emancipation?

The fact is, of course, that several millions out of the forty-two have heard the Fifth, and some hundreds of thousands are acquainted with the Third, Seventh, Eighth, and Ninth. Mr. Galsworthy seems to have overlooked the gramophone, the wireless, the 'Proms,' and numberless other popular orchestral concerts given throughout the country. Even in the cinema one may hear at least a movement of the C minor. And the number of 'emancipated' musicians who regard Beethoven as 'a back number' is more likely to be five hundred than five thousand.

However, little points of this sort do not interfere with our enjoyment of an engrossing picture of post-war conditions in various spheres of life—financial, literary, and artistic. Readers of 'The Forsyte Saga' will be glad to renew acquaintance with Soames and other members of the family, and as 'The White Monkey' ends with Soames becoming a grandfather, there is probably another Forsyte book on the way. So long as Mr. Galsworthy can keep up the form of the 'Saga' and 'The White Monkey' he needn't be in a hurry to stop.

Mr. Herbert Thompson writes asking us to point out an error in his notice of the Norwich Festival. Through an unaccountable slip of the memory he attributed to Norwich the performance of one of Bach's 'Brandenburg' Concertos which he had recently heard elsewhere.

The American musical journals print an amusing exchange of letters between Mr. Ernest Newman (who, readers will remember, is at present acting as guest-critic for the New York Post) and Mrs. Harriet Lanier, President of the Society of Friends of Music. Mr. Newman had attended a concert given by the Society, and had pointed out some weak spots. Whereupon Mrs. Lanier:

> Dear Mr. Newman:
> As you are a stranger in New York, may I draw your attention to the fact that you and Mr. Downes are the only musical critics invited to the Friends of Music concerts, and that these invitation tickets are sent out by my order alone? I regret that you have not been able to come to the two concerts we have given thus far this season. I know you have not been there, because you could not have written of our Bach concert that the orchestra and the chorus frequently had ragged edges, nor of the concert of Sunday last that the orchestra should have had more rehearsals. Our concerts are unique, as there is only one Bodanzky and only one Friends of Music chorus, and the work is finely prepared. I say this advisedly, as it is the opinion of artists—great artists. In pre-war times such concerts were heard in Germany and Austria only. Now, they no longer exist in those countries. It will give us the greatest pleasure to have you at the concerts; but I must beg of you not to allow the office boy to replace you, for we have not invited him. One may like, or not, the work given, but I am sure you will understand that such criticism, utterly without musical understanding, is detrimental to any organization, and when it is, as in this case, not true, it is quite out of order. Had you heard these concerts I am confident that you would be greatly mortified to have your signature attached to such critiques.—Yours sincerely, HARRIET LANIER.

P.S.—Perhaps I had better tell you that I am the president of the Society of the Friends of Music.

We like especially the lady's assumption that E. N. 'could not have written that the orchestra and chorus frequently had ragged edges,' &c. By this time she will have learned that he is prepared to write all that and more if he feels so disposed.

Mr. Newman's reply was as follows :

It is a pleasure to me to hear from Mrs. Lanier at last. Weeks ago—almost as soon as I had set foot in New York—my colleagues informed me that I would have that honour as soon as I had criticised the first concert of the Society of the Friends of Music. I have had to wait till after the second concert, but the pleasure of hearing from Mrs. Lanier is only the greater for having been deferred. ERNEST NEWMAN.

On the whole, Mrs. Lanier may think herself let down very lightly. We have known folk on this side far more roughly handled for less cause. We add that as a result of Mrs. Lanier's attitude in this and similar cases the New York music critics as a body have decided to ignore the 'Friends of Music' concerts, which will in future be given the barest of mention as news matter.

In the Musical Times for December, 'H. J. K.,' in his notice of Madame Frieda Hempel's concert, mentioned her 'impersonation' of Jenny Lind (which, he rightly said suggested the music-hall rather than the concert-room), and added, 'The opinion of Jenny Lind's family on this impersonation would be interesting to have.' We agree with 'H. J. K.,' and have accordingly obtained it from Jenny Lind's daughter, Mrs. J. Maude, in the shape of extracts from protests addressed to the Press by the family. As long ago as May, 1923, a letter was sent to The Times protesting against the Albert Hall placards in which 'Jenny Lind Concert' appeared in large type with Madame Hempel's name below in much smaller. In his report of the concert a few days later The Times critic wrote :

In bringing her entertainment to London Madame Hempel may have forgotten that a very vivid recollection survives here of Madame Jenny Lind, not only as a singer . . . Her direct descendants now living in London have some personal cause to resent this appropriation of her name.

In the following November, and again at a later date, Mrs. Maude wrote to Madame Hempel's agents (Messrs. Lionel Powell & Holt) asking them to do their best to induce Madame Hempel to drop the Jenny Lind impersonation. If they tried, it was without success.

In March, 1924, the Christian Science Monitor inserted a protest from Mrs. Maude, and in November a notice appeared in the Daily Telegraph, Morning Post, and News of the World to the effect that :

. . . the children and grandchildren of Madame Jenny Lind desire to express their extreme distaste for the exploitation of her name, which has been made in London and elsewhere, without their consent, or consultation of their wishes.

In October, Madame Hempel appealed to readers of the Evening Standard and other journals to send to her at the Ritz Hotel any copies they may have of 'the lost songs of Jenny Lind,' whereupon Mrs. Maude wrote pointing out that there were no 'lost songs,' as she possessed all her mother's repertory. On November 19, Colonel Ernest Goldschmidt wrote as follows in the Morning Post :

I should be grateful if you would allow me to enter a serious protest against the manner in which an American lady has been making use of the late Madame Jenny Lind's name for purposes of advertisement. I need hardly point out the annoyance and pain that this use of our mother's name has caused her children and descendants in this country. We resent it deeply, and consider it an unwarranted method of courting publicity. Such methods so far as I am aware have never been resorted to in this country . . . Surely feelings of good taste should deter the offender from further use, . . . especially as she must now be aware that her methods cause offence to the descendants of the late Madame Jenny Lind-Goldschmidt.

Various journals commented unfavourably on Madame Hempel's use of Jenny Lind's name and fame. There is nothing like pegging away if you want to make your meaning clear to those who can't or won't understand, and we are glad to see that these protests and comments (extending over a year and-a-half) have at last managed to make Madame Hempel begin to suspect that somehow her 'stunt' is less acceptable on this side of the Atlantic than it is on the other. At all events, she wrote to the Manchester City News on December 6 :

SIR,—In less than three weeks my tour will be finished, and next year I am coming back to England as Frieda Hempel—myself. It is the only way I ever wished to come. As for 'the lost songs' of Jenny Lind there are of course none, nor have I ever said that there were any. What I did think was that there might be some forgotten ones. I wished to find out what songs lived longest in the hearts of her listeners. But it is not the dress that matters, and it isn't the songs. Somehow, I have been able to stir into life long-smouldering memories — beautiful, inspiring memories. That has been my great privilege, and my only consolation for submerging my own personality.

If Madame Hempel never wished to come to England save as herself, why did she do so? The above letter, with its reference to 'consolation for submerging my own personality,' strikes us as being mere humb——. But we must not forget our manners. The main point now is that Madame Hempel is to return next year minus the Jenny Lind make-up. This is as it should be, for such delightful singing as hers needs no bush—least of all bush that gives offence.

Although the verdict in the Performing Rights case went against Mr. John Coates, there can be no doubt that the sympathies of public and profession alike were with the singer. We do not propose to discuss the case fully. The Performing Rights Society has undoubtedly done much for the composers who belong to it, and nobody is likely to deny it due credit. But one or two points seem to arise as a result of the suit. First, it is clear the case was one of those in which all the parties lose, no matter what the verdict may be. If such singers as Mr. Coates and Mr. Plunket Greene decide to omit from their programmes songs on which the P.R.S. charges a fee, their repertory is the poorer ; as there is no better advertisement for a song than its performance by such singers, their boycott must reduce the sales, and so both composer and publisher are the worse off ; and obviously the musical public and the cause of good music also suffer. There is no department of music in which publicity for the best is more needed than that of songs. As things are now, the scales are heavily weighted against good new songs, since the poor type is not only free from restrictions but is actually subsidised by fees paid to the performer. It seems to us that the P.R.S. might well consider the expediency of waiving the performing fee in the case of singers of eminence. This would be merely an extension of the present policy of sending free copies to such singers. If the price of the song may be waived in certain cases, why not the performing fee as well? Can there be any question as to the result of such a concession being profitable to all parties?

The other point that was made clear by the trial was the anomalous position of the P.R.S. in regard to the copies of the songs bearing no intimation that performers must pay a fee. The onus of discovering whether such a fee is due should not be thrown on the performer. It is no answer to say that the P.R.S. Gazette publishes from time to time a list of composers who are members of the Society. Many works by the composers concerned appear in the catalogues of publishers who are not members, and as such works are free the list is no more than a partial guide. Every work on which a performing fee is charged should bear a plain announcement of the fact, and until the P.R.S. adopts this simple and just plan it will alienate a good deal of sympathy and support which it would otherwise receive.

The church organist—especially if he happen to be at a cathedral—is often airily dismissed as one who lives, moves, and has his being in a musical backwater. Yet all but the least observant of critics must have seen that just now a very large proportion of the finest music-making in the London district takes place in the churches, and is almost entirely the result of initiative on the part of the organists. Elsewhere in this issue of the Musical Times will be found notices of important events at Westminster Abbey, Southwark Cathedral, St. Alban's, Holborn, and St. Margaret's, Westminster. Recently there was the week's Bach Festival at St. Michael's Cornhill, and at many other lesser-known churches, Free as well as Established, there have been performances (too numerous for more than bare mention) of music that a few years ago could have been heard only at the hands of professional performers in a concert-room. As these church performances are free, save for a collection, they undoubtedly bring fine music to the ears of many who would otherwise be outside its reach. (But we are sorry to hear that the collections too often show that many of those benefited want something for nothing—an attitude that may lead to there being nothing for them to have, for it is obvious that such musical services cannot be run at a loss.) Most important of all, we think, is the fact that many of the works thus given are of a type that can be heard to advantage only in a church. They are out of place in a concert-hall, and, but for the efforts of our leading church musicians, they would be either neglected or heard only under such conditions as would destroy much of their beauty.

We have mentioned these London performances specially because they have lately been so numerous as to call for comment. But much the same good work goes on at many churches and cathedrals in the provinces. Thus, at York, a few days ago there was a fine performance of Byrd's 'Great' Service; and our columns frequently bear witness to notable enterprises at other places. In the old days, the chief musicians were invariably organists; it is good to see that at the present time the organist is, perhaps more than ever, the best general practitioner and all-rounder in the profession, and therefore one of the chief pillars of the country's musical life.

Last month we drew attention to the use of gramophone records as a means of bringing performers—especially those comparatively unknown—in touch with concert-givers and others with engagements to offer. We are glad to hear from the Imperial Concert Agency (175, Piccadilly, W.1), which took the first steps in the matter, that the results already warrant an extension of the scheme. Arrangements have been made with the Cliftophone Company whereby a singer can have a hundred records made, packed, and sent out to that number of concert-givers throughout the country, with a special letter, for the sum of £25. This is about a third of the cost of a recital in a London concert-hall, and there can be little doubt as to its being far and away better value. If we had any doubts they would be dispelled by the extracts from letters received by the Agency, copies of which have been sent to us. These are unanimous as to the practical nature of the idea.

A reader sends us a circular advertising a preparation which, if it does all that is claimed for it, should soon lead to unemployment among teachers of singing. It is called 'Vocalax,' and is > . . . an Italian preparation, originated in Italy, and now almost universally used and recommended by the various conservatories, schools of singing, and singing masters on the Continent.

The circular tells us that after using it we shall be able to hear ourselves sing, and that when we hear ourselves sing we are not forcing the voice; moreover, 'Vocalax' will give us a 'feeling of lightness in the middle,' and will strengthen the high notes, 'making it easier to blend.' It sounds a bit vague, except as to the 'feeling of lightness in the middle.' It is so long since we experienced that happy condition that we feel disposed to try a bottle, even at the risk of hearing ourselves sing. For the benefit of readers who are interested on vocal rather than equatorial grounds (if we may so express ourselves) we quote further from the circular:

> WHAT IS SKULL RESONANCE?
> That brilliant, free, and resonant tone of the old Italian School.
> Will give you the wonderful sensation, SKULL Resonance and Vocal ease. Don't delay, get a bottle of VOCALAX now. It means success to you.

In her 'Singer's Pilgrimage,' Madame Blanche Marchesi speaks of various quack nostrums, among others of 'Italian Water at five shillings a bottle,' on the principle that 'in Italy the voices are good because the water is good: if you drink Italian water . . .' In fact, Q.E.D. Readers should not attach uncharitable significance to the fact that 'Vocalax' also comes from Italy, and also is sold in five-shillings-worths. We understand that the Vocalax Company offers various scholarships and prizes to the value of £500 for winners of singing competitions. Thus the first prize is a £250 scholarship, which > . . . consists of two hundred and fifty lessons in voice production, oratorio, grand opera, acting, and stage deportment from the most celebrated professional teachers and performers in London. Also a number of special coachings from one of our great conductors; twelve tickets for the Promenade and Royal Choral Society concerts, and two concerts or operatic engagements in London.

And so on, down to cash prizes of £5. Particulars of these competitions are to be had only by those who send a coupon to the Company's offices, and, in order to obtain a coupon, one has to buy a five-shilling bottle. So we have decided to wait a bit. Still, if 'Vocalax' really does give that feeling of lightness in the middle . . .

The number of practical musicians who are also mayors is so small, that when we do happen to hear of one, we like to make a note of him. Mr. John Horrocks, recently elected mayor of Leigh, in Lancashire, has been a musician from boyhood, and is still at it. At Rossall School he was diligent at both pianoforte and organ; he continued his studies after being claimed by the cotton-mill which he now practically owns. For many years he sang in the Hallé Choir; he is one of the guarantors of the Hallé concerts, and is ever ready with help in any musical project, either as performer or patron. During the war period, Mr. Horrocks was so successful an acting-organist at Leigh that he was asked to continue, and thus the town has an organist-mayor. A friend of ours who called on him recently found he had just been reading 'Feste's' article on duet-playing, and as a result the Mayor and his visitor duetted until midnight. If there were more chief magistrates of this sort, what a move there would be in all sorts of local musical activities!

The revival of interest in Handel's operas will take shape at Cambridge shortly, for 'Semele' will be performed, under the conductorship of Dr. Rootham, at the local theatre on the evenings of February 10-14, with a matinée as well on the 14th.

We have received complaints as to the awards made in connection with the British Empire Music Festival. It is pointed out that one of the conditions in the class for orchestral and choral works is that the work must not be longer in duration than twelve to fifteen minutes, yet the prize was given to the composer of a Symphony which had already been publicly performed, and which certainly extends a good deal over the time-limit. We understand that the Symphony is a good one, but rules are rules, and should not lightly be thrown overboard.

Another complaint is that the executive dropped the excellent custom of hiding the identity of competitors under a nom de plume until the award is settled. The regulations expressly state that the competitor must endorse the outside wrappers of MSS. with his name and address in block letters. A regulation of this sort is simply an easy way of asking for trouble, and the committee seems likely to get it.

Music in the Foreign Press

COUPERIN'S ORGAN MASSES

In the November Revue Musicale, André Tessier writes on two Organ Masses by Couperin, first discovered in manuscript by Danjou in 1846.

The manuscript discovered by Danjou is now lost, but a copy which he made is preserved in the library of the Paris Conservatoire. Another old manuscript is preserved at Versailles. These two, and a third, less trustworthy, manuscript were used by Guilmant for his publication of the Masses in the 'Archives des Maîtres de Orgue.'

The Versailles manuscript is in the same handwriting as the manuscript of Couperin's Motets, or 'Elévations,' in the same library. It is presumable, therefore, that the two Masses are indeed by Couperin le Grand, and not, as sometimes supposed, by his uncle, François Couperin de Crouilly.

Each consists of twenty-one pieces. Both are fine, and there is a good deal in them that recalls the style of Titelouze, although the music is less forcible, and in some respects immature. Couperin wrote them at the age of twenty-two, viz., at a time when he had not yet quite found himself. Nevertheless, they contain many real beauties, the Offertories especially being worthy of commendation.

OLD ITALIAN PART-SONGS RE-DISCOVERED

In the Rivista Musicale Italiana (December), Ch. van den Borren describes certain musical texts contained in a 15th-century manuscript that belonged to the Strasburg Library. This manuscript was destroyed in 1870, but de Coussemaker had copied part of it, and his copy has now been discovered. It comprises a part-song by Nucella (14th century), 'De bon parole,' and one by Anthonius Clericus Apostolicus, which is described as very beautiful and simple.

ITALIAN COMPOSERS OF OPERA BUFFA IN LONDON

In the same issue, G. de Sainte-Foix writes:

> All the famous Italian composers of opera buffa who came to London (such as Galuppi, Sacchini, Guglielmi, Ciampi) were induced by their English publishers to write trios, quartets, and other instrumental chamber works, for which there was a constant demand. It is a pity that this aspect of their talent—whose revelation is entirely due to their sojourn in England—should so often be ignored. Galuppi's sonatas are instinct with subtle charm. Ciampi's orchestral and organ concertos should be worth knowing; and he is said to have written harpsichord sonatas. None of his works are available in modern editions. Guglielmi's instrumental music is spirited and charming. Latilla's string quartets are worthy of attention. Bertoni, Paisiello, Vento, Cimarosa, have also written instrumental works of real vitality. There are reasons why one should beware of the attributions given to the music published by Walsh and Bremner, some of which are questionable, if not obviously fictitious; but these publishers introduced many true masterpieces.

LEARNING FROM HAYDN

In the Zeitschrift für Musik (November), Dr. Georg Göhler writes:

> One-third of to-day's music consists of misunderstood Beethoven, another third of misunderstood Wagner. The warning, 'Away from Wagner!' was uttered long ago; why not warn foolish imitators of Beethoven? If our composers, instead of trying to outbid Beethoven and Wagner would only strive to sharpen their wits and acquire elasticity by studying Haydn, time would surely show whether there is indeed a new Beethoven among them.

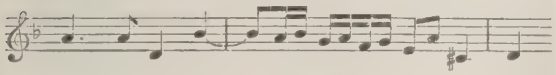
EASTERN MUSIC

The November Revue de Musicologie contains an essay by Marie Thérése de Lens on Moslem songs from Meknés (Morocco), with examples, and five Hebraic songs noted at Salonica by Eugène Borrel.

FRESCOBALDI OR NOT FRESCOBALDI?

In the same issue, an editorial note refers to a fugue, published in a current collection of ancient masterpieces, and ascribed to Frescobaldi. Its subject is:



Information as to its authenticity is invited. No edition of Frescobaldi's works known in France contains it, and its style seems to be that of a later period.

MUSIC PUBLISHING IN GERMANY

In Musica d'Oggi (November), Dr. H. R. Fleischmann considers the reasons for the critical situation of the music-publishing trade in Germany:

> One of the first was the restriction of exports at the time of the collapse of the mark, under the control of the Aussenhandelsstelle für das Buchgewerbe, whose director, Otto Selke, promptly became the most detested person in Germany. With the reappearance of the gold mark, Selke vanished from the scene; but conditions did not improve. Indeed, prices of German music continued to increase, which was of course not good for trade. Another cause of the trouble is the German publishers' mistrust of contemporary music. Very few works by living composers are being published in Germany. A third cause is that few opportunities are afforded to perform new works—which naturally affects sales very unfavourably.

The Musician's Bookshelf

'The New Encyclopædia of Music and Musicians.' Edited by Waldo Selden Pratt.
[Macmillan, 31*s.* 6*d.*]

'Black's Dictionary of Music and Musicians.' By L. J. de Bekker.
[A. & C. Black, 21*s.*]

Hard on the heels of the Dent Dictionary come two more fat volumes. With the new 'Grove' well on the way, the musician will soon be up to the neck in information. The first of the two books under notice is in three parts—(a) Definitions and Descriptions, with an Appendix of Bibliographical Notes; (b) Biographies, and an Appendix of Persons before 1700; and (c) Places, Institutions, and Organizations, to which is added an appendix dealing with operas and oratorios produced since 1900. The volume contains nearly a thousand pages. It is comprehensive rather than exhaustive. As the Editor points out, it contains more than twice as many names as are in the original volume of 'Grove'; but there is nothing in the shape of the lengthy monographs of great composers that make 'Grove' so valuable. The principle of condensation adopted makes it impossible to treat anything with great fullness, and amends are made by referring the reader to such articles in 'Grove' as will carry on the argument. There are no music-type illustrations, but room is found for some full-page portraits, the best of the bunch being an excellent reproduction of Mr. Lambert's photograph of Vaughan Williams. Within its self-imposed limitations this is a valuable work of reference. But one of these limitations is so serious as to call for complaint. In order to make room for the biographies of some nobodies of recent times, a good many somebodies who had the misfortune to be born before 1700 have been given the barest of reference. Print and style are clear, and the convenience of the reader seems to have been considered in every way.

One has to qualify praise in speaking of the Black Dictionary. At a first glance so many inaccuracies show themselves that one loses confidence—a fatal thing concerning a book of reference. Much of the biographical side of the work seems to have been reproduced from an earlier publication, with too little revision. There is uncritical hyperbole at times. Thus, the Beethoven article opens (my italics):

> . . . composed nine great Symphonies [nine, true; but are they all great?], unsurpassed Sonatas for pianoforte, and established himself for all time as the world's greatest master of absolute music. He composed in every form known in his time, often expanding, sometimes modifying, always improving, never inventing . . . assuming no pose of mysticism, stooping to such programme music as a battle piece, elevating that form to the highest pinnacle in the 'Pastoral' Symphony. . . He stands alone to-day—a sun in the musical firmament wherein other composers are the stars, the planets, the comets, if you will—or merely the satellites.

The thought of Bach, Wagner, and Mozart being mere satellites to the Beethovenian sun was prevalent fifty years ago; we don't think that way now—not so much because we admire Beethoven less, as that we understand and know the others more. At the moment of Beethoven's highest fame Bach was practically forgotten, and Wagner was derided—chiefly on the ground that he couldn't write tunes! One is sorry to speak disparagingly of a costly work of over seven hundred pages, but there is no help for it. The compilation of a work of the kind is a big job, even for a large committee of experts: both M. de Bekker and his publishers seem to have taken their task far too lightly. In its glowing red cover the volume makes a handsome show, but in books of reference, even more than in human beings, handsome is that handsome does. H. G.

'These Eventful Years: The 20th Century in the Making. Being the Dramatic Story of all that has Happened throughout the World during the most momentous Period in all History.' Two vols.
[Encyclopædia Britannica Co., 50*s.*]

The article on music in this pretentious compilation is by an American journalist, Mr. Henry Theophilus Finck. There is a strong American flavour about the whole work (note the title itself)—strange in an offshoot of the 'Encyclopædia Britannica.'

Mr. Finck has five and a-half pages out of some fourteen hundred, and we are bound to say we think he wastes most of these. We think Mr. Finck must be a very naive gentleman indeed, when we read such a phrase as '. . . Liszt's great improvement on the artificial symphony in four unconnected movements.' He writes detestable English—e.g., Schönberg 'is a tremendously clever composer, and he uses his terrific technical skill to rub salt into aural wounds made by hideous clashes of sounds excogitated with diabolical, Apache-like cunning.' One need not be a Schönbergian to declare that Schönberg has never written anything so hideous as that. And Mr. Finck goes on: 'This is not a rhetorical exaggeration. It is literally true.' O Encyclopædia! O Britannica!

Mr. Finck is scandalised by 'a group of 20th-century Italian composers — Casella, Malipiero, Pizzetti, Respighi, Pratella, Tommasini.' But, happily for Mr. Finck, 'Puccini has come to the rescue with his delightfully melodious operas.'

The great musical event in Great Britain in the 20th century has, it seems, been the discovery that Grieg was of Scottish origin—'a fine feather in the British cap.' Mr. Finck has a superstition for Grieg—on whom, if he only knew it, the shades of oblivion are already falling. Mr. Finck names a number of composers who were 'strongly influenced' by Grieg—'Percy Grainger, Frederick Delius, Eugène d'Albert, and, in Paris, César Franck, with MacDowell in America.'

Marvel awhile, O ye peoples, at the critical penetration behind that discovery! The conglomeration of names speaks in itself for a lack of a sense of values. Delius and Franck sandwiched thus between nobodies!

It is, then, not surprising that this musical contributor to 'the dramatic story of all,' &c., should not know how to spell the names of Vaughan Williams and Eugène Goossens ('Goosens'). This airy Yankee sums up 20th-century English music for the benefit of the Encyclopædia Britannica Co. thus: 'Such recent composers as Von Holst, Vaughn Williams, Arnold Bax, Frank Bridge, as well as Sir Edward Elgar, have been surprisingly conservative, especially in their copying of German symphonic models, which are out of date.'

On the transatlantic music of the period Mr. Finck is no doubt more authoritative. He tells us that MacDowell's influence among young Americans still prevails, and that 'the real jazz band is made up chiefly of saxophones, although cornets and trombones are not excluded.'

This curious article is illustrated with portraits of nine 'music-makers of our times'—another queer group. The selection is: Debussy, Puccini, MacDowell, Rachmaninov, Kreisler, Sir Henry Wood, Madame Jeritza (an Austrian operatic soprano), Caruso, and Sir Edward Elgar.

Neighbouring articles deal with painting, by Clive Bell, and poetry, by J. G. Fletcher (who is enthusiastic about the epics of Herr Spitteler). The years are eventful, indeed, which reduce the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' to retailing this kind of thing.

'Breathing for Voice Production.' By H. H. Hulbert. [Novello, 3*s.*]

Teachers of singing, and others, will be glad to know that Chapter viii. of Dr. Hulbert's exhaustive and scholarly work 'Eurhythm: Thought in Action' (which is 'Breathing and Voice Production' re-written and brought up-to-date) has now been issued as a separate treatise. It includes: (1) A simplified account of the breathing apparatus (anatomy) and how it works (physiology); (2) A more detailed account of the action of the chief muscles engaged in breathing—the Intercostals, the Diaphragm, and the Abdominal Muscles; (3) The Lateral-Costal method of Breathing and the control of Expiration; (4) Different types of Breathing and their effect upon the voice, the health, and the figure; (5) The Power of Sentiment and Artistry in the training of the voice; (6) Breathing exercises for the voice and health.

A feature of the work is the importance attached by the author to the action of the abdominal muscles in breathing:

> Much has been written and taught about the effect of the movement of the chest upon the shape of the abdomen, but little has been said about the effect of abdominal movement upon the shape of the chest. The abdominal muscles are voluntary muscles, and abdominal movements can be made to become quite subservient to the will. By these movements the shape of the chest, and consequently the action of the lungs, can be controlled.

After explaining some simple movements by means of which the action of the abdominal muscles can be easily understood, and quoting from Quain's description of the action of these muscles and of the muscles of respiration, he continues:

> It seems quite clear from this description that the abdominal muscles have many and varied functions to perform, and that they accordingly merit much more attention than the majority of people seem inclined to bestow upon them. From a health point of view they certainly rank amongst the most important muscles of the body, and yet they are the most neglected.

A close examination of their functions follows, and it is shown how they assist inspiration in the form of breathing called 'lateral-costal.' The author maintains that this is the explanation of the method used by the old Italian school. He also claims that, so far as he is aware, the scientific explanation given by him is original, as are also the hygienic and vocal arguments in its favour, as opposed to those advanced in support of the abdominal system introduced into this country by Mandl, in 1855.

Concerning collar-bone breathing, in which 'the work of the diaphragm is reduced to a minimum, and effort both in breathing-in and breathing-out reaches its maximum,' we read that

> . . . unfortunately this form of breathing, which cannot be commended from any point of view, is that universally taught in the form of physical education that is now in vogue. It has a baneful effect upon vocal tone, making it harsh, piercing, and very unmusical. If it is bad for tone in voice, it is bad also for tone in health.

Following a description of different methods of breathing, interesting tables are given, illustrating the effect of these different types on (1) the breathing and voice; (2) hygiene, vocal and general; (3) figure and poise.

Much valuable advice will be found on the use of breathing exercises. The author issues a warning concerning the practice of so-called deep-breathing exercises:

> In singing and dramatic speaking long breaths are used, but short and medium breaths are equally necessary. In teaching breathing for voice it is necessary to take this into consideration, and to teach medium and short breathing. By practising the breathing of medium and short breaths, elasticity and control of the chest-walls are much more easily acquired, whilst the taking of long breaths (often called deep-breathing) is frequently the cause of strain and rigidity, both of which mean loss of respiratory potentiality: the term 'deep breathing' is answerable for much damage to the voice and health. The crude, forcible methods too often adopted for breathing exercises are useless for and even harmful to the voice. . . . Short and medium artistic breathing exercises will enable the student to take artistic long breaths when required.

And again:

Students when learning to do voice exercises usually take in too much air for the vocal phrase, and instead of releasing the superabundance at the end of the phrase, they add more still, for the next phrase, and so on, until the absolute discomfiture of the strained chest makes them release in quite a forcible manner. This is, of course, directly opposed to all the laws of artistic movement.

The book, which is illustrated by numerous diagrams, includes at the end a number of national tunes for use in accompanying a group of nine of the exercises arranged to follow each other without a break. G. G.

'Dargomijsky. Autobiography, Correspondence, and Recollections of Contemporaries.' Edited by N. Findeisen.

Dargomijsky is, after Glinka, the least known in Western countries of the great Russian composers of the 19th century. The very fact that his fellow countrymen admire him almost as much as they admire Glinka ought to arouse in us a desire to know more of his music. And an additional reason for being interested in him is that he is the only composer whose ideas exercised a real influence on Moussorgsky's.

Prof. N. Findeisen, to whom students of the history of Russian music already owed, among many other things, a useful biography of Dargomijsky (1904), has grouped in this volume the composer's autobiography, all his correspondence, and passages referring to him that occur in the memoirs of various contemporaries. Like most Russian composers, Dargomijsky was a good letter writer, and his correspondence is replete with interesting facts, views, and references to other people's sayings and doings. The passage in the autobiography referring to his own education is particularly worthy of notice.

Glinka, it should be remembered, had found himself compelled to go abroad for instruction. He brought back from Berlin half-a-dozen notebooks in which he had jotted down the principles of counterpoint and orchestration imparted by Dehn, his teacher at Berlin. He lent these notebooks to Dargomijsky, and the two composers jointly devoted as much time as they could to playing and reading music by Beethoven and Mendelssohn. This was all the theoretical instruction Dargomijsky ever had. Until a school of music was founded—which was much later—there was at Petrograd, and, indeed, throughout Russia, a dearth of books on musical theory and an even greater dearth of instructors. The best that composers wishing to learn their craft could do was to pool their experience and resources and information. This was what the younger men did later, Balakirev becoming their leader and teacher. Rimsky-Korsakov, one of Balakirev's first pupils, has expressed himself in a bitter, carping, and not always justifiable manner on Balakirev's influence and teachings. Under the existing circumstances the wonder is, not that Balakirev should have been able to do so little, but that he should have been able to do so much. Of this, however, neither Korsakov nor the translator of his Memoirs have thought fit to remind readers. M.-D. C.

'The Mechanism of the Cochlea.' By George Wilkinson and Albert A. Gray.

[Macmillan.]

The musician as an artist has strictly no concern with acoustics; but as a practical, intelligent being, he is naturally interested in everything that concerns his art.

As regards the science of acoustics, he is probably familiar with his 'Helmholtz,' and most likely has on his shelves that excellent treatise on physical acoustics, by Dr. Barton, of Nottingham. But if he wishes to keep abreast with modern physiological work, the controversial nature of the publications of these later years is somewhat discouraging. There appears a need for the clear statement of the resonance principle of hearing in the light of modern physiology, together with a consideration of alternative views, and this is to be found in a very readable book, 'The Mechanism of the Cochlea.'

Dr. A. Gray is well-known for his studies in comparative anatomy, and in Dr. Wilkinson we find an expositor of lucidity whose ingenious working model of the Cochlea—a veritable triumph of experimental skill—will surely command the admiration of all who revel in a good piece of work.

This book worthily combines the spirit and literary charm of Helmholtz, and as such may be commended to musicians. J. L. D.

'Gustav Mahler-Briefe (1879-1911).' Collected and published by Alma Maria Mahler.

[Berlin: P. Zsolnay, 1924.]

This collected correspondence covering practically the whole of Mahler's life-time will prove most valuable to the student of the composer's biography and individuality. I do not think that many readers will care to keep it to hand, and revert to it for its own sake. Human touches are not lacking, but one misses the thousand sidelights which are naturally expected on people and events, especially on Mahler's outlook on other people's music. Practically the whole of the correspondence refers to himself and to everyday matters. One wonders whether Mahler was actually so self-centred as appears from this book, or whether he was simply a man who restricted his letter-writing to essentials, except for occasional self-revelatory outbursts. No letter to his wife is included in the collection. M.-D. C.

Mr. William Stone has been presented with a gold watch on his retirement from the conductorship of Weymouth Choral Society, a post he has held for twenty-five years. His daughter, Miss Stone, was handed a cheque in recognition of her services as accompanist.

New Music

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

A big batch of new songs from this house is notable above all for some by Peter Warlock. There are several Warlocks. Thus, there is the Warlock who suddenly shook us up a few years ago with the issue of a series of songs that were at once seen to be among the very best produced in modern times. They had tune, delightful accompaniments, a scrupulous choice of text, and, above all, life, gusto, beans—call it what you will, it is the quality that so much otherwise first-rate music died through lacking. Since that day other Warlocks have become prominent. One of them is unduly fond of uncouthness, apparently for its own sake; another has given us such delicate and subtle things as 'Sleep'; yet another is a mediævalist; and, finally, there is the ordinary clever modern composer with the easy trick of writing a simple voice-part and stretching it on the rack of a pianoforte solo that has only the remotest harmonic connection with it. Probably nobody likes all these Warlocks, and I venture to think that the first is still not only the most popular but also the best and most original. Fortunately he is still busy, as is seen by several of these new songs. 'Sweet-and-twenty' is a delightful setting of 'O mistress mine,' with a tune that sings itself and a rhythm that floats (a misprint is in bar 4 of the second page; the quaver in the bass should be A, not G). Two songs more difficult but no less beautiful are 'Autumn Twilight' (Arthur Symons) and 'Consider' (Ford Madox Ford). A good accompanist is needed here, especially in the latter. 'Twelve Oxen' is for baritone and chorus, in unison, save for three bars of two-part writing. This is a tuney, straightforward affair, as befits the folk-song text. 'Tyrley Tyrlow' is already known in its choral form; the solo version is for medium voice, and is an engaging setting of the old carol. There is also a second album of 'Peterisms,' three in number—'Roister Doister,' 'Spring' (the well-known words of Nash), and 'Lusty Juventus' (the poem from Wever, 1555). Here we see three aspects of Warlock's art. In the first he is uncouth. True, the words ('I mun be married a Sunday') call for rough, boisterous humour, but I see no point in some of the hideously ugly and far-fetched stacks of notes (the tune is reminiscent of some of the round games of youth, especially of 'Nuts in May'). The direction at the beginning is 'Rumbustiously'—surely the first time of using! 'Spring' is a charming setting, with bird-calls subtly suggested in the pianoforte part, instead of being thrown at our heads in the usual way; the pianoforte part of 'Lusty Juventus' is a joy. Like that of 'Sleep' noticed last month it is polyphonic, with a texture that suggests a chamber music combination. Its diatonic harmony is refreshing and full of interest. Without a doubt Warlock has no superior among song-composers of to-day, but I wish his publishers would not advertise him as 'The Prince of Song Writers.' There is already a 'Waltz King,' and I seem to have heard of several potentates in the jazz field. Such titles should be left to them. And I don't like Mr. Warlock issuing sets of songs under the title, 'Peterisms.' The label has the defect of conveying nothing; it is even misleading, for the first set of 'Peterisms' consisted of nursery rhymes, and I opened this new set with no expectation of finding three full-sized songs. A composer of Warlock's calibre can get our interest without japes and eccentricities.

'A Shropshire Lad' still draws composers like a magnet. E. J. Moeran has set four of the poems, and issued them as a cycle under the title 'Ludlow Town.' The four are: 'When smoke stood up from Ludlow,' 'Farewell to barn and stack and tree,' 'Say, lad, have you things to do?' and 'The lads in their hundreds.' Mr. Moeran need not fear the inevitable comparison between this cycle and previous 'Shropshire Lad' essays. It stands well even beside 'On Wenlock Edge,' though it may make a less immediate appeal. I can spare space for the mention of only one of the admirable qualities it shows, and I choose the one that is least often shown by song composers to-day, especially the young ones. Mr. Moeran has acquired thus early the knowledge of what to leave out. There are several pages—especially in 'The lads in their hundreds'—where the accompaniment suggests Stanford in its successful reliance on a few detached chords. But when the text demands the setting up of a background full of colour and suggestion, he can do it as clinchingly as anybody. See, as two widely different examples, the pianoforte part of the grisly 'Farewell to barn,' and the subtleties and simplicities of that in 'When smoke stood up.' Baritones who are also musicians, and who have a liking for the grey and earthy melancholy of 'A Shropshire Lad,' should make a note of 'Ludlow Town.' It places Mr. Moeran at once among the pick of our song-writers. (But I hope his publishers will not advertise him as such, à la Warlock.)

Seven of the songs in this parcel are by Norman Peterkin—'I heard a piper piping,' 'The Galliass,' 'She's me forgot,' 'The garden of bamboos,' 'I love the din of beating drums,' 'Advice to girls,' and 'Song of Asano.' I am sorry to be unable to join those who see in Mr. Peterkin one of our hopes in the song field. There is a sense of effort about most of the music in these settings—too many crawling discords, and too little real impetus in melody and rhythm.

W. G. Whittaker's 'Bog Love' is a starkly diatonic and striking setting of an Irish song that starts as if it were going to be amusing, and turns out after all to be poignant. But Dr. Whittaker perhaps carries economy to extremes in the pair of little songs, 'Stay in town' and 'Spring' (the Poet Laureate's 'Spring goeth all in white'). In a pair of Blake songs under one cover, by Hubert J. Foss—'As I walked forth' and 'Infant Joy'—there is real charm and tenderness, with a skilful use of folk-song idiom both in tune and rhythm. And every note in the pianoforte part is necessary—a rare virtue in modern songs.

Two good additions have been made to the series of solos from Maurice Greene's anthems, edited by Stanley Roper—'O give me the comfort' and 'My lips shall speak the praise,' the latter a capital florid song of the Purcellian type.

CURWEN EDITION

The outstanding songs in this month's parcel are the half-dozen extracted from 'Hugh the Drover.' They are 'Here on my throne,' 'Gaily I go to die,' 'Sweet little linnet,' 'Alone and friendless,' Hugh's 'Song of the road,' and 'Life must be full of care,'—the last-named beautiful in its simplicity and tenderness. There are also a couple of albums, one containing two duets, 'Ah! love, I've found you' and 'Hugh, my lover'; and the other the rousing Showman's songs with chorus, 'Cold blows the wind on Cotsall,' and 'The devil and Bonyparty.' The opera is so well known to many through its performances and gramophone records, that there is no need to dwell on the excellence of these extracts.

Similarly, no more than mention is needed of four more songs from Armstrong Gibbs's 'Midsummer Madness'—'Neglected moon,' 'The rejected lover,' 'Arrogant poppies,' and 'Chains of love.'

Of the remaining songs from this house, I am most struck by Owen Mase's 'A Welcome,' a beautiful little song in which five-four time, diatonic harmony, and a severe economy of notes, are combined in the most natural of manners. In its delicacy and directness it reminds one of the best examples of the Lutenist school. In Gretchaninoff's 'The little green house,' and Felix White's 'Bridal Song' the rather ordinary character of the thematic material is not compensated by the ingenuities of the pianoforte part. Dennis Arundell's setting of A. P. Herbert's 'The Sailor' ought to be very funny, but somehow isn't, despite the humorous directions, 'With a longshore lilt,' 'Lurchingly,' &c. Mr. Arundell must learn to joke wi' less deeficulty.

V. Sackville West's verses, 'The Persian Coat,' don't seem to call for setting, but, granted the need for music, Gordon Bryan's is as neatly appropriate as can be wished for. The accompaniment is for harp or pianoforte.

VARIOUS

'A Sussex Alphabet' (vol. ii.), is a song-cycle 'for children and grown-ups,' in which Eleanor Farjeon's neatly-turned verses dealing with that delectable shire are attractively set by Harry Farjeon (Joseph Williams). Arthur Sandford's 'In beauty moulded,' though in a series entitled 'Modern Songs,' is too deliberately in the manner of Purcell—a good imitation, but we want composers to express themselves naturally (Joseph Williams). Percy Judd's 'Song of Autumn' is a dolorous setting of Shelley's 'The warm sun is failing, the bleak wind is wailing. . . . The chill rain is falling, The nipp'd worm is crawling,' &c. Ugh! Autumn has other aspects better worth singing about. His 'Song of Winter' takes a more cheerful text—'When icicles hang.' There is plenty of life in the music, but it is rather oversophisticated and difficult (Boosey). Victor Merriman's album of three songs (Patersons) shows more ambition than skill. A footnote tells us that the first of the set—'The Fountain'—gained the first prize in composition at Glasgow and Nottingham Competition Festivals. It shows promise, but like its companions it contains passages that reveal the 'prentice hand. Mr. Merriman's next step should be the study of writing pianoforte accompaniments.

NEW MUSIC FOR STRINGS

The most important publication of the month in respect to string music is undoubtedly Julius Harrison's 'Prelude-Music Quintet' for two violins, viola, violoncello, and harp (Curwen). The harp part may be played on the pianoforte—not, however, without some loss of colour and general balance of tone. It is a well-written work and of a more individual character than is usual with Harrison, and this, to my thinking, is its most important and promising feature. A musician who has had the advantage of wide experience in conducting, can easily enough turn his hand to composition with some credit. But unless his music has distinctive features, it can never rise above the pièce d'occasion—the sort of thing which is easily applauded and still more easily forgotten. Of course individuality is a very elusive thing. We may say of it, as of style, that it is 'the man.' That sounds convincing, and indeed almost obvious. But the definition does not take us very far. Wagner's music, intensely individual, does not in the least reflect qualities which were characteristic of the man, nor does the evanescent art of Debussy give us the slightest indication of the shrewd, business-like instincts of its creator. A clearer and truer definition might suggest close kinship between individuality and sincerity. If you have the courage to be ardent in an age which worships cold formality, you may be accused of practising the trick of singularity, but if the choice is the outcome of conviction you will also be sincere. Mr. Harrison in this Quintet gives the impression now and again of being moved to composition not so much by the desire to vie with other gifted people, but by some deeper feeling. This is the reason why some of us will place the Quintet well above the average work of the day.

Malcolm Davidson's 'The Day's Work,' for violin and pianoforte (Curwen), has the merits and the demerits of good musicianship, for even musicianship—the instinct that draws one to music and makes him note with ease and sympathy the working of musical art—has its drawbacks. It kindles an ambition (wholly praiseworthy in the student) to show what we can do, to show that we are not a whit less dexterous than the men who are 'in the swim.' Mr. Davidson's Suite consists of three 'sketches' of which the first depicts 'Morning on the hills'; the second, 'The Siesta Hour'; the third, 'A Travelling Circus.' The plan shows a certain ingenuity, and the same may be said of the music. When, however, we consider the effect the work produces on ourselves, we find that not all these good intentions hit the mark, and that with much that is pleasant and attractive there is something the interest of which might be described as academic were it not that the composer boldly proclaims his complete emancipation from academic rules.

More limited in scope and far less ambitious are Adolph Mann's 'Spanish Serenade' (Bosworth) and Felix White's 'Sweet Thoughts in a Dream' (Curwen) — both for violin and pianoforte. The Serenade is perhaps the more melodious of the two, and is also easier. But while 'Sweet Thoughts' are certainly very sweet, the 'Spanish Serenade' could easily be still more Spanish.

Messrs. Augener have sent us a group of pieces for violoncello and pianoforte by P. Spencer Palmer (Sarabande, Bagatelle, Legend), of moderate difficulty, obviously meant for the student, and good enough of their kind. Adam Carse's 'Fiddle Tune' (same publishers) for violin and pianoforte, however, fulfils the requirements of the student-piece even better. The violin part does not go beyond the third position, yet it gives many an opportunity for the application of valuable lessons in phrasing, bowing, &c. The most important work on this publisher's list is Tivadar Nachez's violin arrangement of Bach's six Suites for violoncello solo. It would be idle to pretend that these equal in importance the Violin Sonatas. A brilliant piece like the Prelude of the last Sonata, the monumental Chaconne, the Gavotte in E, find no parallel in the various numbers composing the 'Cello Suites. And if there is to be a boom in Bach, other pieces will claim priority. In the whole Bach repertory there is nothing lovelier than the Adagio which Richter used to incorporate in one of the 'Brandenburg' Concertos. Yet, although with its introductory Prelude it makes a splendid solo, modern violinists have ignored it completely so far. But we cannot have too much Bach. The importance of the Sonatas for the student cannot be over-rated. Nothing else exists to take their place, for nothing else leads with such certain steps to the acquisition of firmness of bowing, of fingers, and of a solid style. The 'Cello Suites, now ably arranged, may well serve as a sort of 'Paralipomena' to the great Sonatas.

A new Kreisler arrangement is always welcome, and the 'Midnight Bells' (Bosworth), a Viennese melody from 'The Opera Ball' of R. Heuberger, carries on worthily the tradition of 'Rosmarin' and the other valses adapted by Fritz Kreisler with the love of a true Viennese and the knowledge of the past master. Mabel Brittain's 'Dreams' (Bosworth) and Chaminade's 'Les Sylvains' (Enoch)—both for pianoforte and violin—are easy, melodious, and rather undistinguished. B. V.

CHURCH MUSIC

Some recent issues of polyphonic Church music contain several numbers of outstanding merit. Three Motets published by Chester—Latin text only—are edited by H. B. Collins. 'Ave Regina,' by Peter Phillips ('Cantiones Sacræ,' Antwerp, 1612), is for five voices (S.S.A.T.B.). Its difficulties are not great, and a well-trained choir could easily make it effective. William Byrd's 'Christus resurgens ex mortuis' is a Motet for Easter on the Plainsong ('Gradualia, Liber Primus,' London, 1610). It is for four voices, but an additional part for 1st tenor has been arranged by the editor to strengthen the low notes of the alto. The 2nd tenors (or baritones) sing the plainsong. Byrd has treated his subject expressively, and the music throughout, from the striking opening theme (to the words 'ex mortuis') to the joyful 'Alleluias' which conclude the work, is full of impressive touches. The same composer's Motet 'Tu es Pastor Ovium,' in honour of St. Peter ('Gradualia, Liber secundus,' London, 1610), is for six voices (S.S.A.T.B.B.). It is a stately work, and calls for strong, massive treatment.

John Taverner's Mass for four voices, 'The Western Wynde' (Chester), has been edited and arranged for liturgical use (Latin text) by H. B. Collins. A short preface supplies some interesting comments on the work and its composer, who died some time between 1543 and 1553. Palestrina's first book of Masses, it is worth while recalling, appeared in 1554. Of the beautiful melody on which the Mass is founded nothing seems to be known. In tonality it belongs to the first mode transposed. The editor points out that the Mass itself is a very early example of the Variation form; the variations, however, are entirely in the different counterpoints. The melody itself remains almost unchanged throughout, appearing either in the treble, tenor, or bass, but never in the alto, the only rhythmical change being that it occasionally occurs in triple time. The work contains some masterly counterpoint, and the treatment is in more than one place remarkable. The editor justly refers to 'the wonderful Crucifixus' and to the ascending scale-passage for the basses in the Sanctus which occurs five times in succession, after the manner of a ground bass. Some beautifully expressive writing occurs also in the Agnus Dei, which, by the way, in company with the Sanctus and Benedictus, has had to be considerably shortened to render the work suitable for modern liturgical use.

From Novello's come three other works of the same school. Palestrina's Motet, 'Adoremus te,' is for two sopranos, alto, and tenor. It is edited by C. Hylton Stewart, and an English version accompanies the Latin text. It is a quiet, devotional little work which could be undertaken with advantage by choirs unable to tackle more elaborate settings. The same composer's Motet, 'Exaltabo te, Domine,' edited, with Latin text, by H. Elliot Button, is for five voices (S.S.A.T.B.). It is a joyous work, with strong, flowing counterpoint of a straightforward type. Its chief difficulty lies in the wide range of the voices. Basses must be prepared to sing occasional top F's, the tenor part frequently extends upwards to A, while the altos on a low F are sometimes singing the lowest part. Choirs in a position to treat this point with indifference will enjoy singing this motet. The remaining Novello issue is perhaps the gem of all the works so far considered. This is the Motet, 'O bone Jesu' (O Blessed Jesu), by William Child (1606-97). It is for S.A.T.B., with organ accompaniment, and is edited, with Latin and English words, by H. G. Ley. It is a wonderfully expressive little work, both as regards harmonic and melodic treatment. The opening phrase is arresting. Over a sustained chord of E minor on the organ (pp) to the words 'O Blessed Jesu' the tenor sings to the rhythm the notes B, C, D, B, B. This expressive drop in the melody is beautifully treated in the succeeding phrase, where the trebles—with the altos a third below—rise stepwise from G to B over a chord of C on the organ and then drop to F♯ in the next bar over a chord of B. Another expressive touch is the drop of a diminished 4th at the words 'O Jesu,' where, e.g., the altos sing G, D♯, D♯, followed a few bars later by the treble D, A♯, A♯. Much of the writing is harmonic in style. The few brief passages of contrapuntal writing are no less expressive than the rest of the work; incidentally, they bring about some effective examples of the augmented triad in various positions. Technically, the music is not difficult. All it requires is beautiful singing.

One other polyphonic work must be briefly noticed. This is a 'Tantum Ergo' by Tomas Luis de Victoria (1540-1603), arranged for men's voices (T.T.B.B.), by Howard Hinners, and with Latin text supplemented by English words by Albert Parker Fitch (H. W. Gray Co.). The plainchant appears in turn in the three lower parts. It is not difficult, there being little in the way of contrapuntal writing, and in this arrangement should be easily effective.

Of a small group of modern works for unaccompanied singing, Cecil Forsyth's setting of the Lord's Prayer for S.A.T.B. (H. W. Gray Co.) appeals by its simple and devotional character. Sung by a good choir it should be impressive. An imposing effect by very simple means is obtained in the closing bars. An interesting contrast in style is provided in Harry Farjeon's setting for three female voices of 'Salvator Mundi' (Novello), with English words after Victor Hugo by L. Cranmer-Byng. In this—slight and brief though it be—the composer's harmonic methods make no inconsiderable demands on the singers if his intentions are to be fully realised. The average Church choir will find itself on familiar ground in dealing with C. Lee Williams's short anthem, 'He is a Father of the fatherless' (Novello). This was written for this year's Three Choirs Festival of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford. Attractively written in a straightforward style, it presents few difficulties. A short anthem for S.A.T.B., 'O hearken thou,' by Cyril Jenkins (Paxton), while quite simple, contains some interesting touches and should prove effective.

Choirs on the look-out for good, strong unison settings of the Canticles should note some of the latest issues of the Oxford Church Music Series, under the general editorship of W. G. Whittaker (Oxford University Press). These all reach a high level of excellence. Settings of the Evening Canticles are contributed by George Dyson (C minor) and Charles Macpherson (C major). The former composer is also responsible for a setting in C of the Te Deum and Benedictus. Lastly, H. G. Ley has written some highly effective music for the Te Deum for unison singing and school festivals, a feature of which is the fine organ part on three staves. Optional descants are also provided, and it should be noted that a vocal edition is issued separately.

W. A. Roberts has written an admirable shortened and simple setting of the Benedicite omnia Opera (Stainer & Bell). It is in chant form, and in the key of C.

Recent numbers of the S.P.C.K. Church Music Series include two settings of the Evening Canticles by the Rev. Christopher Thompson to various Gregorian tones with faux-bourdon harmonies. They are very simple, and the vocal harmony throughout is so constructed that it may be sung either in faux-bourdon (four parts, unaccompanied) or in descant (the upper part and plainsong only). In the second of these settings (No. 30) something has gone wrong with the harmony in the last bar but one: the impossible F in the bass should be corrected by B.

An attractive little carol, 'The Christ-Child,' by George Rathbone, is issued by Novello as a unison song. Under the same cover appears a simple unison song by Alec Rowley, and other brief items. In the same publishers' School Song Series appears a short Morning Anthem for boys' voices, 'Awake, my soul,' with music by Charles Macpherson, in Tonic Sol-fa. The Staff notation edition appears in Novello's Chorister Series of Church Music.

Two Carols for Christmas, by Arthur H. Brown (Oxford University Press), include under one cover a happy setting of 'There dwelt in old Judæa,' the well-known 'When Christ was born of Mary free,' and the equally well-known evening hymn 'The day is past and over' ('St. Anatolius'). Finally, under one cover may be obtained from Curwen's Two Christmas Faux-bourdons, written by Martin Shaw to the well-known 'O come, all ye faithful' and 'Christians, awake' (Wainwright's popular tune).

EASY PIANOFORTE MUSIC

Three capital albums of pieces published by Forsyth should prove welcome to young players. 'Welsh Melodies,' arranged by Cyril Jenkins, would suit pupils in the elementary stage. They are twelve in number, and are fully fingered; indeed, in this respect, perhaps too little is left to the pupil's own judgment. Most of the tunes are treated diatonically in a straightforward way; one or two—e.g., 'Land of my fathers' and 'The Marsh of Rhuddlan'—appear in modern trappings. Taken altogether these pieces provide interesting and useful practice for young people.

Rather more difficult is Leslie Fly's 'Joan of Arc'—a set of nine miniatures which should appeal to imaginative youngsters. They are charmingly written, and the best of them reach a high level. For teaching purposes they are admirable.

W. G. Whittaker's 'Four short pieces' consist of 'A Lazy Piece' (excellent for pedal practice); 'A Jolly Tune' (good for independence of hands); 'A Creepy Piece' (chromatics and syncopated pedalling); and 'Chopsticks.'

'Pleasure Pieces' appear in two books (Elkin). Book 1 (easy) contains Cyril Scott's 'Musical Box' and 'Cradle Song'; Roger Quilter's 'Slumber Song,' from 'Where the Rainbow ends'; a 'Graceful Dance,' by C. W. Pearce (excellent for independence of hands); and pieces by Ernest Austin, Edith Alford, and H. Scott-Baker. Book 2 (moderately easy) includes Elgar's 'Organ Grinder's Song,' from 'The Starlight Express'; Norman O'Neill's 'Dance of the Joys,' from 'The Blue Bird'; Roger Quilter's 'Fairy Ballet,' from 'Where the Rainbow ends'; Cyril Scott's 'A Song from the East'; and Ernest Austin's 'A Jovial Tune.'

A set of six easy teaching pieces under the title 'Tarry Awhile,' by Blanche Rennie (Bosworth), should prove useful in assisting the development of the child's imagination. This object is helped by the accompanying verses and by the composer's little chat on each piece.

M. E. Marshall's 'Air and Variations' (Bosworth), although very simple, are thoughtfully written, and give an opportunity for quite elementary players to make early acquaintance with this form. The same composer's 'The Chimney Corner' (Bosworth) is a set of ten easy pieces which will be found useful for little players of very slight attainments.

A piece that will probably appeal to young people is Ernest Austin's 'Christmas Morning' (Larway). In addition to opening and closing with an easily negotiated jangle of bells, it includes a rousing presentation of 'The First Nowell,' clothed in highly-coloured modern harmonies.

Edgar Moy's 'From the Beginning' (Winthrop Rogers) is a collection of seventeen short pieces. They are carefully graded, and as pieces for beginners may safely be recommended.

In Richard Walthew's 'Holiday Waltzes' (Augener) the waltz idiom is in the main far from being obtrusive. These six little pieces—suitable for Lower Division candidates—are cleverly written, considerably varied in style, and present the pupil with problems of technique not usually associated with this form of music.

We have received from Messrs. Ellis, 29, New Bond Street, a list of old music for stringed instruments, and some rare instruction and theory books, some in first editions.

BACH AT OUNDLE

Our readers will remember that Bach's B minor Mass was performed at Oundle School in December, 1923, the whole of the boys taking part either as choir or 'non-choir' (the 'non-choir' consisted of the main body of the School, and sang certain special passages and phrases.) Last month (December 14) the 'Christmas' Oratorio was performed. At the time of writing no report has come to hand, so we have no data beyond some advance particulars of the concert. Parts 1, 2, and 3 of the Oratorio were done, with certain numbers from the rest of the work. All the Chorals were included save one, and all the choruses except the first in Part 5. The soloists announced were Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. Topliss Green. All the tenors and basses, and the whole of the 'non-choir' were to sing the da capo in 'Mighty Lord,' and all the trebles and altos the da capo in 'Slumber, beloved.'

We hear, and can well believe, that the effect in 'Mighty Lord' at rehearsal was thrilling. It is interesting to hear, too, that although the whole school has shown its usual keenness, it prefers the Mass. Not many years ago the average public school-boy would scarcely have known that there were such works. To-day, there are hundreds of him, not only getting first-hand knowledge of both, but being able to express his preferences—and no doubt able to give a reason for them! This seems to us to be the best of answers to those purists who object to some of the methods of Oundle, such as the use of the 'non-choir' and the turning of some solos into choruses. We hold that so fine an end more than justifies the means. Mr. Clement Spurling, to whose energy these remarkable Bach performances are mainly due, may well be proud of the results.

AND AT THE LEYS SCHOOL

But Oundle is not alone in its Bach enterprises. At the Leys School a Bach concert in the School Chapel has been an annual feature since 1920. The latest was held on November 23, when Cantatas Nos. 53 ('Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen') and 93 ('Wer nur den lieben Gott lässt walten'), and a Chorale were sung by the School Bach Choir, composed entirely of boys, save for one visitor—a tenor from Trinity College Chapel. The choir was was made up of twenty trebles, six altos, seven tenors, and ten basses. Relief was furnished by organ Chorale Preludes, among them that on 'Ein' feste Burg,' with the whole School singing a verse. The soloists were Miss Dorothy Silk, Mr. T. Purvis, and Mr. A. N. G. Richards; Mr. Herbert Barr played the trumpet, Mr. Bernhard Ord was at the organ, the strings in the orchestra were drawn from Cambridge University, and the wood-wind and brass from London. Mr. J. F. Shepherdson, who started these Bach concerts, conducted.

Next month we hope to give some particulars of the founding and organization of this boys' Bach Choir.

The Celtic Faculty of University College, Cork, will shortly issue a 'Handbook of Irish Music,' a posthumous work of the late Dr. Henebry, Professor of Irish Language and Literature at the College. The book will be published by subscription, at 12*s.* 6*d.* The author's aim is to trace Irish music to its originals, and to show its evolution by analyses by typical melodies. Subscriptions should be sent to Prof. T. O'Donoghue, University College, Cork.

Church and Organ Music

ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS

The Bach Fugue set for the July, 1925, Fellowship Organ Test is the G major (Novello Ed., Bk. 8, p. 12), not G minor, as stated in the College notice last month. Another change is to be noted: instead of the Overture to 'Otho,' candidates will play the Largo sostenuto from Vaughan Williams's 'Sea' Symphony, arranged by H. G. Ley (Stainer & Bell).

After the distribution of diplomas on January 24, an informal conversazione will be held. Members and friends have so few opportunities for social intercourse at the College, that this new departure should be warmly welcomed.

ACCENTUS AND CONCENTUS

By Dom Anselm Hughes, O.S.B.

It is the fashion in these days to write papers and books about Church music, which merely skim over the surface of a subject of immense importance without penetrating to any depth. In moderation such instructions do good: but the prevailing impression on one who approaches the subject from the outside standpoint of the secular musician or a non-musical churchman is that there is far too much of a sketchy and elementary character about the musical information provided. Unless we aim higher in music, and deeper in our knowledge of it, than we seem to be doing to-day, the future of English Church Music will suffer. The cult of the simple in art, for its own sake, is a fallacy, for art is the combination of sounds, or forms, or colours, or movements, into a complex whole; and the more complex the whole, the higher (if that combination be harmonious) is the art. We must beware of this fashionable cult of the simple in music.

This paper is written to recommend boldly that music in church should be more elaborate than it is at present. The objector replies that it is already far too elaborate in many places, and that we are hoping for deliverance from the present ineffective imitations of the Cathedral service which are so widely prevalent. Agreed; our only difference is in the interpretation of the term 'elaborate.' In asking that music shall be more elaborate I do not stand to the defence of long settings of portions of the Communion service or of the Canticles, with the words repeated in pointless and wearying iterations, with loud and violent callings upon Abraham (and his seed) and the like, nor am I concerned to uphold the majority of the anthems of varying merit performed with greater or less efficiency in so many churches. What I venture to plead for is a more careful study of the real facts in Church music—the etymological suggestion of the term 'elaborate,' a real grasp of the fundamental principles underlying it, and for the right and proportionate recognition of Accentus, the simple general music of the main structures of our services, and Concentus, the elaborate choral treatment of certain portions.

To arrive at the real principles we must throw the light of history upon the question, not forgetting the other lights of philosophy and art, which (as Cardinal Newman points out in his 'Lectures on University Education') are necessary to a true understanding of any subject.

The period of history in which we can study the choral music of the English Church in isolation naturally terminates at the point when the organ began to be regarded by composers and executants as an essential part of the musical service of the Church. This epoch is generally—and accurately—placed about the time of the death of Purcell (1695), but for some hundred years before that the curtain had begun to fall. The beginnings of the period coincide, of course, with the first appearance of Christianity in these islands.

Musical history, however, does not begin in England until the 10th century, and the seven centuries thus left provide us with three distinct eras in Church music. First we have the period of unison music to Latin words, most of it more or less elaborate. Do not advocate Plainsong because it is simple: advocate it because it is (like all true art) elaborate when it ought to be elaborate, and simple when it ought to be simple. Which leads us back to the subject of our title—Accentus and Concentus—the names given to the two types of music which have existed in the Church from the earliest times. Accentus, the music which is essential to the minister and the due performance of divine service; Concentus, the more developed music performed to the glory of Almighty God (and incidentally, though not essentially, for the uplifting of the hearers) by those who love to devote their time, labour, skill, and talents to singing His praises. The most obvious illustration in our Cathedral service to-day is the Anthem, placed as it is in close contrast to the Versicles and Responses, which are plainly of the Accentus. Plainsong has its types of Concentus and its types of Accentus, each in due proportion. The more elaborate forms of Plainsong are exceedingly scientific and artistic developments, and may rank as high as most of the concerted music of later days.

The period of Plainsong occupies the longest division (about a thousand out of fourteen hundred years) of this country's ecclesiastical history, for the field of English choral music contains three other departments, two of which can trace their succession down to the present day, namely Polyphony (from 1450 onwards), and what I propose to call Huguenot music (from 1550). Polyphony, i.e., part-singing, began before the Norman conquest, and developed gradually and steadily until, by 1450, it had passed out of the experimental stages and had become the normal custom in such choirs as those of the King's Chapel—then a movable institution—St. George's, Windsor, St. Alban's Abbey, and other places—probably Bury St. Edmunds, Reading, Worcester, and some others we are not able to name with certainty owing to the destruction of the MSS. in the following century. Polyphonic music has always been reckoned as of the very highest order: indeed, the giants of the polyphonic age—notably Byrd in England, Palestrina in Italy, Vittoria from Spain—are admitted to have carried the possibilities of pure choral music to a higher point than have any of the great composers of the later or 'orchestral' periods, not excepting even the great Bach himself. At first sight it might appear that polyphony was an imperfect form of art viewed in its ecclesiastical aspect, for the Accentus seems to be lacking, but this is not really so; for by far the greater part of the polyphony of the classical times was built upon some plainsong 'tenor' or theme, while in certain examples, such as the Office hymns, Vesper psalms, and Magnificats, the contrapuntal pieces were designed to alternate with solid verses of plainchant, thus using the system of contrasted Accentus and Concentus in its naked simplicity. And many of the psalm-settings of Morley and Tallis in England, or of Bernabei in Italy, provided for an Accentus to be sung simultaneously with a Concentus of soprano, alto, and bass. This is the familiar form known as faux-bourdon.

But the chants of Morley and Tallis are to our ears extraordinarily reminiscent of the Anglican chant, and bring us on to the third division of our chosen period, here designated by the unusual name of Huguenot music. The term is used for four reasons: first, for want of a better; second, because it has a theological and Protestant significance; third, because it is suggestive of vernacular music; fourth, because it serves to correct the current idea that the simple music associated with the Reformation was indigenous to England, or that it originated in Germany. The Puritan and Protestant types of music which gained a footing in England in the late 16th century are alien in origin, and owe more to France than to Germany.

The extremely plain and simple music that is connected in many minds with the first English Prayer Books—music such as Merbecke, or Tallis's responses in five parts as arranged indifferently for four voices by Barnby, or the 'Christchurch' tune, the 'Old Hundredth,' and the rest of the metrical psalms—has little or nothing which is distinctively English about it. Even Cranmer's direction to Merbecke that he was to use one note and no more to each syllable was not entirely original, a demand for some such alteration having already been made on the Continent. What Cranmer was doing, of course, was to try to see if he could reduce all Concentus music to the level of Accentus; it is precisely what certain well-meaning people are trying to do to-day. The true stream of English Church music ran in the course taken by Shepherd, Causton, Tye, Byrd, Whyte; by Peter Philips and Richard Dering, by Orlando Gibbons, greatest of them all after Byrd, and finally by one who, though in our circumscribed department of subject-matter he ranks only third, in the whole of English music is reckoned facile princeps, Henry Purcell.

Of the third department, Cathedral Music, nothing need be said here, except that Cathedral Music fits into the historical division above as the inheritor of the Polyphonic tradition, with which it has incorporated elements from the schools of oratorio (and sometimes even opera) together with its own original contributions.

The principle of Accentus and Concentus is a liturgical principle applied to music. It will therefore be understood if we study a liturgy in infancy, and see how it is clothed. From the strictly authoritative point of view the music of the English liturgical services is still in swaddling clothes. The Liturgy itself has only Merbecke's jejune setting: the Morning and Evening Choir-offices, little more. All the other music which has been associated with the Prayer Book services consists of private efforts, accepted, recognised, and hallowed in numberless cases by a tradition spread over many generations or many localities.

'The Order of the Holy Communion, commonly called the Mass,' was not (it need hardly be remarked) a new invention in the second year of King Edward VI.: the rite used was but a translation, with certain alterations, of that which had been sung by our forefathers for a thousand years. We cannot therefore consider the musical structure of the English service in isolation from its Latin progenitor.

What then are the features of Concentus and Accentus in the Latin Mass? How do we divide the service between the parties?

We must note first that the division is to be not between (a) Priest and (b) People-led-by-a-choir, the usual faulty and unhistorical division made so often in these days, but between (a) Priest-and-People and (b) Choir.

In the Latin Mass of 1546, or at any rate of 1480, before polyphony had had any effect upon the service, the parts made over to the specialised choral body were the Introit, Gradual, Alleluya, Offertory, and Communion. Kyrie, Gloria, Credo, Sursum Corda, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei were theoretically the parts where the general body of worshippers joined with the priest. In practice, from about the time of the Norman Conquest onward, the Gloria, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei were sung to a variety of melodies, at any rate in the larger churches, and were probably not very congregational. But the Credo was universal, and one of the gratifying features of the present time is the growing restoration of this universal Credo to universal use. The unvarying singing of one unison melody, of immemorial antiquity—some authorities rate it as far back as the 6th century—of the One Creed, is a practice the symbolism of which is obviously most commendable. We understand that at Westminster R.C. Cathedral no other melody has ever been sung since the building was opened.

With this solitary exception, however, the arrangement of the service as we have it to-day has developed along lines precisely opposite to those indicated by history. The congregational 'numbers' have become choir items, and the Introit, Gradual, Offertory, and Communion, which were formerly the opportunities for the choral body to offer elaborate music, are now replaced by congregational hymns. Liturgical developments are frequently the outcome of the real religious needs of the Church, and Liturgy is a living fact, not a dead one. Because this reversal is not justified by history, it does not necessarily follow that the modern development is wrong. There is something to be said in its favour, and something against it.

On the side of the modern practice we have first of all the difference between prose and verse. It is notably easier (except in plainsong) for an untrained or partially trained congregation to sing hymns in metre, leaving the prose hymns such as Sanctus and Gloria to the trained choir. We have also this difference between the two classes of text: that the Kyrie, Creed, Sanctus, Agnus, and Gloria are invariable, and therefore seem to require (with the exception of the Creed) a variable treatment of the music, if for no other reason than to mark the different seasons of the Church: while the metrical hymns, varying as they do from Sunday to Sunday, naturally suggest the desirability of music which is more familiar, so that the attention of those who are singing may be the more easily concentrated upon the meaning of the words.

But we think that these two considerations are outweighed by the greater fact which is expressed by the historical form. It is a historic fact that the great prose hymns of the Mass have come to be essential and invariable parts of the service, at least on Sundays. The psalm-verses at the Introit and so on are variable decorations; they are of secondary rather than primary importance. The historic and eminently suitable place for the choir to sing a musical commentary upon the lessons of the day is in the old place between the Epistle and the Gospel, not when the profession of our belief is being recited. The Prayer Book which we use to-day provides Offertories to be sung: the Prayer Book of 1549 gave also Introits and Communions.

As has been said above, liturgical development frequently expresses the needs and the minds of the Church, being a natural outcome of man's devotion. But if it is the accidental result of an incomplete musical répertoire either of the choral body or of the congregation, or if it is wrong in principle—as in the suggested case of an uncongregational setting of the Creed—then we must spare no effort to rectify our practice. Leaving the question of Credo aside for the moment, it does not seem to be a matter of cardinal importance whether or no we retain the present practice of a congregational introit-hymn and a choral Kyrie, but any tendency towards reversing the present state of things we should support, for such a change is justified by history, art, theology, and reason.

What is of cardinal importance, however, is that we should realise, and act on, the distinction between Accentus and Concentus. The surpliced choir is not, as some would have us believe, an invention of the Oxford Movement. The Tractarians built better than some of their followers to-day give them credit for. They knew the need of England was for a more liturgical form of worship, and they knew that from the earliest times minister, choir, and people had been the three divisions of worshippers. In these democratic days we are disposed to magnify the people so as to get rid of the choir altogether; the logical outcome of this tendency will be to get rid of the minister as well as the choir. Loose talk about the Church being a democracy results in loose action about her music. In the Kingdom of Christ every member thereof has his own vocation and ministry, the trained singer in the choir as well as the priest and churchwarden or the general body of the congregation.

In individual parishes general experience seems to suggest that where the division between those parts of the service in which the choir is to put forth its best and most elaborate efforts, and those in which the congregation is expected to know and sing the music, is in full working order, in such parishes 'difficulties' and complaints about the music are reduced to a minimum. Such an arrangement is not merely suitable to the facts of the case, but is required by them. It is not a compromise (a thing useless in religion, where feeling runs too deep to be ignored), but a concordat, and a condition in which much advancement of Church music may be looked for, to the glory of God and the spread of His Kingdom upon earth.

The Southwark Diocesan Plainsong Association will hold its annual general meeting on January 17, at 3, in St. Hilda's Hall, Crofton Park, S.E. The meeting will be followed by a lecture on 'Plainsong and its Accompaniment' by Dr. George Oldroyd. Both meeting and lecture are free to all interested in plainsong. Tea will be served at 5.30, and those who intend to be present are asked to send word to the hon. secretary, Mr. Godfrey Sceats, 18, Ballina Street, S.E.23, not later than January 12.

We have received the list of service music to be sung at the evening services at St. Giles's Cathedral, Edinburgh, during the present season. It includes 'Jephtha,' Bach's 'Sleepers, wake!' Advent and Christmas selections from 'The Messiah,' Part 3 of the 'Christmas' Oratorio, excerpts from Brahms's 'Requiem,' and on each Sunday during Lent a half-hour selection from the 'St. Matthew' Passion. In addition, half-hour organ recitals are given on Wednesdays at 3; lists of the organ voluntaries and words of the anthems used for the month are published in leaflet form. All this bears witness to the enterprise of the organist, Mr. W. Greenhouse Allt.

On November 24 Mr. Herbert Walton gave the inaugural recital on the new organ at High United Free Church, Nairn. His programme included Wolstenholme's 'Fantaisie Rustique,' Bach's Fugue in D, Guilmant's 'Funeral March and Hymn of Seraphs,' and Elgar's 'Pomp and Circumstance.' The organ, built by Messrs. Henry Willis and Lewis & Sons, is a two manual of twenty stops.

The Parish Church at Burford was crowded on November 27, when a Festival of hymn and carol singing was conducted by Dr. Henry Ley, Mr. Fletcher Mann being at the organ. Solos were sung by Mr. Thewlis, of Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford. The singing, led by the Parish Church Choir and the Witney Wesleyan Singing Class, was very hearty.

At St. John's Wood Presbyterian Church, Marlborough Place, N.W., a new organ, erected in memory of the late Rev. J. Monro Gibson, was dedicated on November 26, Dr. Charles Macpherson giving the opening recital (programme not received). The instrument was built by Messrs. Bishop, and is a three manual of thirty-two stops.

The annual Spring Festival of the London Sunday School Choir will be held on February 14, at the Albert Hall, at 6.30. The choir and orchestra will consist of a thousand adult performers. The soloists will be Miss Florence Austral, Mr. Walter Hyde, and Mr. Allan Brown.

In our note in the December Musical Times on the pamphlet 'Suggestions for Musical Evenings,' we stated that no price was given, and that presumably copies were to be had gratis. We now understand that the price is 4½*d.*, post free, from Oxford Chambers, Leeds.

Brahms's 'Requiem' was sung by the Grafton Philharmonic Society at Clapham Congregational Church on December 3. The soloists were Miss Faith Hooper and Mr. Charles Young; Mr. Henry F. Hall conducted, and Mr. Reginald Redman was at the organ.

On December 1, at St. Philip and St. James, Booterstown, Dublin, Bach's 'Cantata, 'Come, Thou Blessed Saviour,' and the Chorale, 'Jesu, Joy of man's desiring,' were performed by an augmented choir and string orchestra. Mr. F. C. J. Swanton conducted.

At each of the Tuesday mid-day recitals (1 p.m.) at St. Lawrence Jewry, during January, a Widor Symphony will be played. These fine works are so rarely heard complete that organists should make the most of this opportunity.

Cherubini's 'Requiem' in C minor was performed by Unity Church Choral and Orchestral Society, Islington, on December 4. Mr. W. Sahnow conducted. The programme included also the Overture to Gomez's 'Salvator Rosa.'

The recitalists at Westminster Cathedral during January are: January 8, Dr. Harold Darke; 15, Mr. E. T. Cook; 22, Mr. H. Goss-Custard; and 29, Mr. Harvey Grace. The recitals are at 6.30.

Brahms's 'Requiem' was sung at St. Paul's, Halifax, by St. Paul's Choral Society, on December 10, with string orchestra and organ (Mr. W. Gledhill). Mr. Thomas Newboult conducted.

Mr. Albert Orton has recently given a series of five Bach recitals at St. Anne's, Soho. His programmes included four of the Trio-Sonatas and eighteen of the Chorale Preludes.

Mr. Malcolm Courtenay Boyle has been appointed sub-organist of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, and conductor of the Windsor and Eton Choral and Orchestral Society.

Parts 1, 2, and 3 of the 'Christmas' Oratorio will be sung at the City Temple on January 10, at 3.

Organist, Nonconformist Church; hydraulic-blown; salary £10.—Provincial Paper.

It seems cheap, even though he doesn't have to raise the wind himself.—Punch.

Gramophone Notes

ÆOLIAN-VOCALION

The Æ.-Voc. gives us the first complete Haydn Symphony, the choice falling on the 'Oxford.' The players are the Æolian Orchestra, conducted by Mr. H. Greenbaum, to whom we owe the excellent records of Mozart's G minor. On the whole, the Haydn is a bit disappointing. The playing is good, but there is a lack of clearness in the recording. Is the orchestra too large? Seeing that a string quartet almost invariably comes through far better than a string orchestra (even though the actual power may be less), one cannot help feeling that a mere doubling or trebling of the parts would be preferable to anything like a full orchestra. Perhaps this plan has been tried. Anyway, it is a pity that music like this of Haydn, which depends so much on brightness and clarity, should not get a better show. I don't wish to imply that the recording is bad. It is good enough to give pleasure to those who know the music, and are in sympathy with this early type of symphonic work, but not good enough to make converts. The best passages are those in which the wood-wind is concerned, especially one delightful bit near the end of the Finale (three 12-in. d.-s.).

The Æolian Quintet is recorded on a 12-in. d.-s., playing an arrangement of Debussy's two Arabesques. No. 1 strikes me as being better in its original form as a pianoforte solo. The playing and recording are good.

There are some excellent records on the vocal side. Olga Haley sings Rachmaninov's 'The Harvest of Sorrow' with due intensity (but with imperfect diction, unless the recording is unjust), and is even better in Schubert's 'Auf dem Wasser zu singen' (12-in. d.-s.). Morlais Morgan's words come out clearly in Keel's 'Bonnie George Campbell' and Newton's arrangement of 'The Jolly Tinker.' When he achieves this clearness with less obvious effort, he will be a first-rate gramophone singer, as his voice is musical and comes through well (10-in. d.-s). Malcolm McEachern, on the other hand, gives us the words as easily as winking. And what a voice! If there is a finer one to-day I have yet to hear it. Hence my regret at his using it on such poor material as Percy E. Fletcher's 'The Great Adventure' and David Richard's 'The Skipper of the Mary Jane.' However, I must admit that he makes the latter enjoyable (12-in. d.-s.).

Rosa Raisa is heard in 'Mira, d'acerbe lagrima' ('Il Trovatore') and in the duet 'L'Altra notte in fondo al mare' ('Mefistofele'), with Giacomo Rimini. Rimini bellows and forces the tone to such an extent that it is sometimes difficult to spot the notes; Raisi's singing is splendid, with all the agility of the coloratura singer and much more warmth. It is a pity she ends the 'Lagrima' song with a gasping, hiccuping sob. This bit of realism may be all right on the stage; elsewhere it is merely ludicrous.

Here is an instrumental record that I forgot to mention last month—a 12-in. d.-s. of Lionel Tertis and Ethel Hobday in the third and fourth movements of Brahms's Sonata in F minor. The work was originally written for clarinet and pianoforte, and our opportunities for hearing it in that form are so rare that we must be thankful to Mr. Tertis for having annexed it. It is delightful music from start to finish, and the playing and reproduction could not be bettered. Incidentally, it is worth noting that the pianoforte really sounds like a pianoforte all the time, instead of suggesting a super-banjo, as it does too often at the hands of soloists.

May I make a suggestion to the Æolian-Vocalion authorities? Their dark green labels with black lettering are indecipherable by artificial light unless one holds the record within a few inches of a lamp. Even by daylight one has to go to the window to read them with ease. The point is a small one, but if it causes as much annoyance to others as it does to me, readers will thank me for mentioning it.

COLUMBIA

Pride of place this month goes to the record of Arthur Catterall's performance of Mozart's Concerto No. 5 in A, conducted by Hamilton Harty. For finish of playing and excellence of reproduction, this record is among the pick. The work is given in full, save for a cut of half-a-dozen bars or so. Most of us hate cadenzas, but if they were all as delicate in substance and as beautifully played as the one in this work we should be converted. There are four 12-in. d.-s., issued in an album, on each page of which is a note about the portion of the work concerned.

The Court Symphony Orchestra is heard in selections from 'Patience' and 'The Punch Bowl,' conducted by Norman O'Neill, and A. W. Ketèlbey.

The Grenadier Guards Band provides seasonable fare in W. Partridge's 'Christmas Gems' and Amer's 'All on a Christmas Morning.' The latter will pass, but Mr. Partridge gives his 'Gems' a poor setting—'The First Nowell,' 'Adeste Fideles,' and 'Nazareth' (the last-named with some harmony that Gounod didn't write) being linked up—or separated—by arpeggio passages of the feeblest description. Only crack military bands seem to be able to descend to such banalities as this.

A bad error of taste of a different kind is that committed by the Savoy Havana Band in its 'Christmas Medley.' Surely these players might have kept their jazzing hands off Christmas carols! Such things have associations of a character that make their use in dance music jar horribly.

The Century Quartet sings a medley of eighteen nursery rhymes, with orchesta. It is all too strenuous and sophisticated for me, but then who am I when such things are doing? The youngsters are the judges here, so I have tried this 12-in. d.-s. on the children of the establishment a good many times, and I am sorry to say that they like them immensely. I console myself with the monologues of Milton Hayes and Vivian Foster (12-in. d.-s.). The former, in 'The Meanderings of Monty,' and the latter, in 'The Parson and the Collection,' are genuinely funny, and every word is heard. The old lady in 'David Copperfield' (wasn't it?) whose watchword was 'Let us have no meandering,' would have changed her mind had she heard what Monty could do in that way.

H.M.V.

The 'Unfinished' Symphony has already been recorded several times, so H.M.V. comes along with yet another set, at least as good as any. The players are the Albert Hall Orchestra, under Sir Landon Ronald (three 12-in. d.-s.).

A pianoforte solo with an interest of its own is Leonard Borwick's arrangement of 'L'Après-midi d'un faune'—an astonishing bit of transcribing. Mark Hambourg's playing of it is no less surprising. None the less, I would rather hear him in some 'straight' pianoforte music. The Debussy piece cries out for its orchestra. That opening little flutter down the scale evokes an atmosphere when played by the flute; on the pianoforte it is a mere twiddle (12-in. d.-s.). Suggia's playing is all we expect it to be in Sinigaglia's 'Humoreske' and a Popper 'Tarantelle,' so good as to make us forget the poverty of the music—almost (12-in. d.-s.).

The vocal records are strong in the most literal sense. Chaliapin storms his way through the 'Golden Calf' and 'Serenade' from Gounod's 'Faust'; Caruso is recorded in a couple of popular songs—one Neapolitan and the other Spanish. The music is nothing, but the gusto of the performance is overwhelming—ringing power, with no apparent effort. People talk about so-and-so being a second Caruso; there is no tenor with a voice and style to mention in the same breath as Caruso.

Typical operatic records are of Florence Austral in Senta's ballad, and 'Mother, you know the story,' from 'Cavalleria'; Battistini in 'Eri tu' and 'Urna fatale'; Tudor Davies in two excerpts from 'Oberon' and 'Der Freischütz'; and Ansseau in a couple from 'Lohengrin.'

Last month a reference to the series of 'Hugh the Drover' records was crowded out. There are five of them (12-in. d.-s.), and they make a very enjoyable set because of the tunefulness of the material. The singers don't allow us to hear more than an occasional word, unfortunately. Particularly jolly is the first record, in which the scene at the fair is given with a vividness that we have hitherto expected from Russian rather than from English composers; the second has a delightful bit of pipe and tabor for the Morris music; and the other outstanding side is that on which the challenge and fight are recorded.

Letters to the Editor

THE EARLIFST KNOWN DUET

SIR,—In Henry Davey's 'History of Music,' mention is made of a duet for two players on one virginal, or organ, by N. Carleton. This is found in British Museum Add. MS. 29,996. R. Carleton was a contributor to 'The Triumphs of Oriana,' but I can find no mention of N. Carleton, excepting the above. In Stanford and Forsyth's 'History of Music,' the name of Carleton is mentioned, with more than sixty others, of English musicians of 1500-1600, as occurring in MSS. in the British Museum, Lambeth, Caius College, Cambridge, and the University Library, Cambridge.

As a means for a wife and husband keeping up the study of music after marriage, no better or pleasanter way can there be than by the playing of pianoforte duets. May I suggest a few from my own music library, which are not mentioned in 'Feste's' delightful article in the December issue?:

Variations on a Theme of Schumann's, Brahms; Fantaisies, Mozart; also his original Duet Sonatas; Suite, S. W. Waddington; Suite, Purcell (arranged by Hurlstone); Swedish Dances, L. Schytte; Original Pianoforte Duets, Weber; Serenade (for string orchestra), Elgar; English Dances, Algernon Ashton; Schubert's original Pianoforte Duets; MacDowell's 'Moon Pictures'; 'Children's' Overture, R. Quilter; 'Legends,' Dvorák (written originally in pianoforte duet form, but since orchestrated).—Yours, &c.,

Pocklington, York. E. A. H. CRAWSHAW.

SHERIDAN'S 'THE DUENNA'

SIR,—In the article on 'The Duenna' in your December issue, 'P. A. S.' makes a slight blunder by stating that this musical piece was produced at 'Drury Lane' in 1775. The fact is that Sheridan's sparkling comedy was first produced at Covent Garden Theatre on November 21, 1775. It had a remarkable run of seventy-five nights. The cast included Mr. Mahon Leoni and Miss Brown. A pirated edition of it, under the title 'The Governess,' was played at the Theatre Royal, Dublin, on January 31, 1777.—Yours, &c., 'HISTORICUS.'

BRAHMS'S SYMPHONIES

SIR,—As a London concert-goer, may I be allowed to express gratitude for the exceptional opportunities for hearing Brahms's Symphonies that have been afforded this season? I do not know how it is with other people, but the more I hear these works the more remarkable and distinctive they seem in their wealth of melody, harmony, rhythm, and tone-colour. There must surely be many like myself, lacking perhaps in a firm grip of the intellectual content of the four Symphonies, and yet finding them inexpressibly satisfying. One ventures to hope that they may continue to be performed with reasonable frequency.—Yours, &c.,

71, Edna Road, S.W.20. J. H. HOBBS.

THE BRITISH EMPIRE MUSICAL FESTIVAL: A PROTEST

SIR,—May I launch a protest against the mode of procedure followed in the award of the gold medal, by Messrs. Broadwood, for British composers who submitted the best work for pianoforte solo?

The announcement has been made that the medal has been awarded for a work for two pianofortes! Clearly this is against the conditions set forth in the regulations.

An act of this kind rather tends to discourage any British composer from again employing his gifts, to invite treatment after this fashion.—Yours, &c.,

'FAIR PLAY.'

[We are sorry to be obliged to hold over a good deal of correspondence.]

Sharps and Flats

I thought that Mr. F. E. Weatherly would be a man of quite six feet high, as everyone would imagine who had read and sung the magnificent verses that he has written. He reminded me of Pinsuti. Pinsuti was a little man, yet he wrote 'I fear no foe in shining armour.' Meyerbeer also was a little man.—Charles Manners.

How I would have enjoyed hearing Sousa play 'Yes, we have no bananas!'—Jascha Heifetz.

I suppose I am very old-fashioned, but I have never heard a note of jazz. I am very curious about it. I have heard so much about this American invention. I cannot even imagine what it will sound like.—Nicholas Medtner.

While all musicians have gone red, the violinists alone have stayed behind, holding the fort of C major. The pianists neglect Beethoven for Bartók. The singers turn to Schönberg and jazz. But the violinist stands pat. What was good enough for his father is good enough for him. . . . Year after year 'The Devil's Trill' . . . all the little treasures, the hyphenated sweetmeats, the arrangements and transcriptions! Over and over and over again!—Paul Kochanski.

The Amateurs' Exchange

Under this heading we insert, free of charge, announcements by amateur musicians who wish to co-operate with others.

Accompanist (lady) wishes to meet vocalist or instrumentalist for practice. S.W. district.—V. T., c/o Musical Times.

Vocalist (soprano) wishes to meet lady accompanist one evening a week for practice. Modern music.—C. M., c/o Musical Times.

'Cellist and a pianist, or 'cellist only, wish to meet other instrumentalists, or to join an orchestra for mutual practice. Good collection of music. Violinists of medium ability welcome. N., N.W., or Central London.—'CELLIST, 20, Oseney Crescent, Kentish Town, N.W.5.

Wanted, a lady 'cellist to complete a trio for classical music. Two evenings a week.—F. B., 8, Dacres Road, Forest Hill, S.E.23.

Pianist and violinist wish to form small orchestra. All instrumentalists. No previous experience necessary.—S. J. SMITH, 39, Pulleyne Avenue, East Ham, E.6.

Contralto, training, wishes to meet pianist weekly for mutual practice.—30L, c/o Musical Times.

Tollington Orchestra resumes practices on Monday, January 5. Vacancies for trumpet (or good cornet), trombone, and viola players. Excellent library.—CONDUCTOR, 19, Heathville Road, Crouch Hill, N.19.

Baritone, experienced, good reader, wishes to join male-voice quartet. S.E. district.—W. G. ADAMS, 19, Hurstbourne Road, Forest Hill, S.E.23.

Chiswick and Gunnersbury Philharmonic Society (conductor, Mr. David M. Davis) resumes practices at Chiswick Town Hall. Orchestra, Monday, January 5; Choir, Thursday, January 8. Vacancies in both sections. 'Il Trovatore' (concert version), March 3.—Hon. secretary, Mr. E. LESLIE SIKES, 223*a*, Hammersmith Road, W.6.

Soprano wishes to meet good accompanist for mutual practice. Blackheath or district preferred.—I. L. D., 4, Eliot Vale, Blackheath, S.E.3.

Good amateur musicians required for St. James's Orchestral and Choral Society. Practice, Wednesdays. Only good works performed. Mr. BOWN, 225, Romford Road, Forest Gate, E.7.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

REVIEW WEEK

The arrangements for this new feature in the curriculum were recorded in our December issue. The greatest keenness was displayed by the students during the whole of the 'Review Week'; and the increase in interest, along with the broadening of outlook which have resulted from the presentation of a properly co-ordinated scheme of study, have amply justified the experiment.

The usual terminal orchestral concert was given at Queen's Hall on Tuesday afternoon, December 9. Owing to indisposition Sir Henry Wood was unable to conduct, and his place was taken by Mr. Cuthbert Whitemore. Amongst the more interesting items may be mentioned the Symphonic Concertante by Mozart for violin and viola (Messrs. Jean Pougnet and Harry Berly), the Suite in B minor for flute and strings (flute, Mr. W. Alwyn), and Bach's Triple Concerto in D minor for three pianofortes, in which the solo parts were played by Messrs. Clifford Curzon, Norman Franklin, and Reginald King. The purely orchestral items were the Prelude and Liebestod from 'Tristan and Isolda,' two movements from Brahms's Symphony in E minor (conducted by two students, Messrs. Ifor Jones and Leslie Regan), and Dorothy Howell's attractive symphonic poem, 'Lamia.' A brilliant performance of the first movement of Moszkowsky's Pianoforte Concerto in E major, by Miss Doris Hibbert, and vocal pieces by Verdi, Handel, and Ambroise Thomas, completed the programme. The fine singing of Miss Hélène Taylor in the 'Mad Scene' from Ambroise Thomas's 'Hamlet' deserves special mention.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The last few weeks of the Christmas term produced so many concerts and dress rehearsals that it is not possible to do more than draw attention to one or two of the more interesting performances.

Of the two orchestral concerts given during the last week of term, the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's suite, 'Scheherazade,' was the distinguishing feature. This work, played under the direction of Mr. Adrian C. Boult, made demands which were not exacted in vain, for the College Orchestra has rarely given a performance more fully in accord with its best traditions. One of the orchestral programmes was especially interesting from the fact that a large portion was conducted, as on many previous occasions, by student-conductors—advanced members of the Score Reading and Conducting Class.

The Patron's Fund Rehearsals during the term, of which there were three, brought forward several new works by British composers, the most distinguished perhaps being some Hebridean Melodies by Malcolm Davidson. The rehearsals for executive artists widened still further the area from which the performers are drawn. Mr. Robert Silvester, of Leicester, played the Brahms Violin Concerto, Miss Gladys Puttick, of the London Academy of Music, played Philipp Emanuel Bach's Pianoforte Concerto in D major, and Miss Etty Friedländer, of the Glasgow Athenæum, played a movement of Mozart's Violin Concerto in D major.

Sir Ernest Palmer is of course well-known as the founder of the Patron's Fund mentioned above, and it would seem that his desire to conquer fresh worlds has once again taken a practical and generous turn. With the greatest pleasure we now announce that he has made a further gift to the College by establishing 'The Ernest Palmer Fund for Opera Study' in the Royal College of Music. The object of this Fund is to assist the study of all kinds of opera, especially English opera, and any music requiring stage representation, in the College, and to further the development of the resources of the theatre there, and, so far as practicable, make it available for composers and students of opera generally, by giving them facilities for rehearsals and trials. From time to time one or more operatic exhibitions, tenable at the College, and called the 'Ernest Palmer Opera Exhibitions' will be offered for competition.

The following awards were announced at the close of the term: Council Exhibitions—Carlowitz Ames, Eleanor B. K. Gregorson, Barbara M. Ensor, Greta M. Pybus, Leonard F. S. Rooker, Winifred H. Burton, Ethel M. Pearce, Fritz E. Brandt, Elizabeth V. Maconchy, Mair O. Phillips, Dora W. Hyde. Additional awards—Muriel I. Kistner, Alexandra F. Hayes, Elma M. Haddow. The Grove Exhibition was divided between Gwendolen G. Higham and Roland T. Pask. Directors' awards—Eric A. Saunders, Zoe B. Stringer. Gowland Harrison Exhibition—Marie Wilson. Leo Stern Memorial Gift—Gethyn Wykeham-George (scholar). Tagore Gold Medal—Marie Wilson (scholar). Dove Prize—Trefor Jones (scholar). Waley Scholarship—William Gurney (1923), Harold Sykes (1924) Lesley Alexander Gift—Joyce Cook, Muriel Hart, Constance Marchant. Henry Blower Memorial Prize—Janet I. Powell; highly commended, Dorothy M. Kitchen.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC

A memorial library and stained-glass window were recently dedicated at the College to the memory of the late Sir Frederick Bridge. There were present: the Earl of Shaftesbury (President of the College), Sir Hugh Allen, Sir Richard Terry, Sir Landon Ronald, John B. McEwen, Prof. J. C. Bridge, and other distinguished musicians and friends. After the opening and unveiling ceremonies had been performed by the Earl of Shaftesbury, and that of the dedication by the Rev. W. J. Foxell, chaplain of the College, Sir Hugh Allen and Sir Landon Ronald paid appropriate tribute to the memory of the late Sir Frederick.

At the usual terminal chamber music and choral concert held at Steinway Hall, a very successful performance of three movements from Beethoven's Septet was given by a party consisting entirely of students. The Choir sang some unaccompanied numbers with good effect.

There were some three or four noteworthy items in the programme of the students' orchestral concert given at Queen's Hall on December 10, viz., the playing by the Orchestra of the whole of Stanford's 'Irish' Symphony and of John Ireland's Symphonic Rhapsody—two well-contrasted compositions—and the capable playing by Miss D. G. Callender of the long and exacting first movement of Brahms's B flat Concerto. The programme also included a creditable reading of the first movement of Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto by Mr. Harry Blech, and was completed by a performance of that rarely played but fine 'Fantaisie Dialoguée,' by Boëllmann, for organ and orchestra.

MADRIGALS AT OXFORD

The use of adventitious aids to the enjoyment of music, apart from the case of opera, is continually coming up for debate. Miss Jean Sterling Mackinlay is a perpetual challenge to the purists' objection to a hybrid art, and though her blending of drama, in the shape of gesture and action, with music and costume and lighting, is often very happy, most people who admit the charm of the old songs and ballads when treated in this way, must have felt at times that they prefer thoroughbred to mongrel art. But it is impossible to generalise, and it is better to judge each case on its merits. An interesting experiment of the kind has just been tried at Oxford, where the Elizabethan Singers and Mr. J. B. Fagan conspired to give an evening of madrigals in the Playhouse (the Oxford repertory theatre), in a simple stage setting with costumes of the period.

The Elizabethan Singers are a party of six singers (two women and four men), under the leadership of Mr. Charles Child, of the Cathedral choir, who have been singing together for some years, and have now achieved a high degree of perfection in balance and ensemble. The programme they gave on this occasion (Sunday evening, November 23) consisted entirely of Tudor music, with the one exception of a folk-song arrangement, and the only anachronism—inevitable under the circumstances—was a concealed pianoforte accompaniment for Gibbons's 'The Cryes of London.' King Henry VIII. and Ravenscroft were represented by two jovial 'ayres to 4 voices,' Byrd by his 'Ave Verum,' and 'The Triumphs of Oriana' by Weelkes's 'As Vesta was from Latmos,' for six voices; and variety was provided by two-part canzonets of Morley, and Ayres of Dowland in their four-part vocal version. The idea of costume and lighting was Mr. Fagan's, and the setting was as simple as the costumes were gorgeous. The stage was lighted with a soft light, and the house kept in darkness, except for occasional intervals in which programmes might be consulted.

On the whole the experiment must be accounted a success, for we got more of the music, not less, through the theatrical environment. The singers sat round a table and behaved quite naturally, so that there was no kind of movement or action to distract the attention. On the contrary, the darkness of the house and the pleasing picture on the stage brought about a spontaneous concentration, and enabled the wonderful fresh beauty of the music to make a quite exceptional appeal. MEMORIAL TO THE LATE PROF. FREDERICK NIECKS

Old students and other friends of the late Professor will be glad to hear of Prof. Tovey's Memorial Scheme for Edinburgh University. It is intended to place in the University Music Class-Room a portrait plaque, to be cast in bronze from a plaster plaque already existing; and to institute an annual prize in Musical History. For these purposes it is desired to raise a sum of £150. Subscriptions are being received by Miss Agnes Johnston, 4, Coates Place, Edinburgh.

The Musical Association has elected Dr. Charles Wood as President in succession to Sir Hugh Allen.

London Concerts

RECENT ORCHESTRAL CONDUCTING

London has lately seen something of the work of a native conductor who has of late years only rarely appeared here, of two foreign conductors who were unknown here until quite recently, and of another foreign conductor who has never previously appeared on a British platform.

Furtwängler I have now heard five times—once at Rome and four times in London. At Rome he had ten rehearsals for his concert, and I suppose that for each of his London concerts he had only two. On the other hand, the Roman players are not so well equipped as are the London players, and I do not know that, on the whole, the Rome performance was any better than the London events.

What Furtwängler probably needs is a band of London proficiency, and rehearsals of Continental abundance. As things are, I cannot assent to the unlimited praise his British audiences gave him. One great performance I have heard from him—that of Beethoven's fifth Symphony last February. In Strauss's 'Death and Transfiguration,' at the Philharmonic recently, he gave us all the slow parts too slow, and all the loud parts too loud, and brought out fully the morbid side of the music and even exaggerated it. In Beethoven's seventh Symphony he failed to get precision from his players, and the higher qualities were not hinted at. At the L.S.O. concert on November 24 he conducted Brahms's fourth Symphony. In the soft passages the lack of exactitude was marked, the wood-wind in particular rarely entering with unanimity. But in the last movement he brought out the individuality of the thirty-three variations very clearly. In 'Till Eulenspiegel' he worked up a great climax, but it was of the kind that makes its effect from lack of competition, like a solitary mountain in a great plain—in other words, the preceding part of the piece was very deliberately kept down in order that this part might appear to rise more than it actually did. (But note that by 'climax' and 'rise' I am not alluding merely to bigness of tone, which is only one element in a climax.)

Bruno Walter made a great name in this country by his conducting in the German season at Covent Garden last summer. But it was very observable that people began to praise him before he had earned the praise, for it was only when he had had the band in his hands for some time that the effects he obtained from it were particularly fine—as they then undoubtedly were.

Similarly people have praised him without measure for his conductorship of the concerts of the Philharmonic on December 4, and of the L.S.O. on December 8. Yet at the former he gave a really blatant maltreatment of Elgar's first Symphony, with the brass passages horribly vulgarised, and at the latter a quite ordinary performance of the second Brahms Symphony, with very little blend of tone and no great precision or unanimity amongst his forces. He conducted a Mozart Symphony on each occasion—the 'Haffner' at one concert and the E flat at the other. He does much better with Mozart, I think, than some exacting critics are disposed to admit, but he has a German habit of dulling the effect of the Minuets by too slow a speed.

With Bruno Walter, as with Furtwängler, it probably amounts to this—give him a first-rate orchestra and unlimited rehearsal and he will do great things. Potentially he is probably as great a conductor as his recent audiences have thought him to be, but it is discouraging to see potentiality clapped as though it were actuality. The London public is at present suffering badly from a lapse of standard in its criticism of orchestral performers. The playing has gone down, and the public's understanding of what is good playing has gone with it.

Monteux, at the Covent Garden concert of the British Broadcasting Company, did well. The acoustics of the theatre are favourable to an orchestra playing on the stage, and both detail and ensemble were very well heard. In the Chausson Symphony (which it has been stated by several writers has never been heard before in London, but which I believe did have one performance at Queen's Hall years ago), Monteux showed us a piece of music that might well take a regular place in our repertory. There is a good deal of Chausson's teacher, Franck, in this music, and some Wagner, but it has individuality nevertheless. The themes are good and are well developed, and the orchestration is very effective.

In the more familiar Brahms 'Variations on a Theme of Haydn' and the Strauss 'Don Juan,' one had a better chance of judging of conductorship. Its prevailing quality was clarity. Every detail stood out well, yet the general or 'all-through' effect of each piece was well realised. With all respect to the great reputations of Furtwängler and Bruno Walter, it must be said that Monteux's conducting on this particular occasion gave greater pleasure than theirs upon the recent occasions above alluded to. The Monteux evening was thoroughly enjoyable throughout, whereas to the judicious listener the other evenings provided cause for irritation at imperfections of performance that appeared to be quite overlooked by most of the audience.

When all is summed up, by far the finest orchestral playing we have this season enjoyed in London has been that of the Hallé band under Mr. Hamilton Harty. The treatment of the Berlioz 'Fantastic' Symphony at the concert on November 25 was perfect. This is a big word to use, but there is no other available. A public that cannot recognise the beauty of well-shaped phrasing, of living rhythm, of balance of instrument with instrument, and blend of strings, wood, and brass, as sections and with one another, of continuity (or what I have called above, 'all-throughness'), of precision in attack, and of the other qualities, small and big, which the Hallé players and Hamilton Harty give us, is incapable of realising that in them it possesses exponents of the very highest class.

If the Hallé Orchestra came from abroad it would have to be praised as having given us the best we have heard for a long time, and the fact that its members are our own kin need not restrain us.

An item of the Hallé programme was the Mozart Bassoon Concerto. It was wonderfully well played by Mr. Archie Camden. P. A. S.

QUEEN'S HALL ORCHESTRA

Sir Henry Wood and the new Queen's Hall Orchestra gave a Symphony concert on November 22; they played light music at a Chappell popular concert on November 29; and they did honour to Mr. Robert Newman on December 6. These were three successful afternoons. What was it filled the hall for the first of them—Brahms's third Symphony, Miss Myra Hess in the Schumann Concerto, or the fifth 'Brandenburg'? Probably the certainty that all were of good and certain value in every movement, and the additional certainty of fine performance. Then there was a 'Cassation'—delightful word!—by Mozart, in G. The popular music a week later included the 'Fantaisie Dialoguée' of Boëllmann, with Mr. Kiddle at the organ. For Mr. Newman's benefit concert there was again, and happily, a very large audience. This was judiciously brought about by baiting the programme with Casals (in Boccherini) and the Beethoven C minor. Sir Henry Wood was too unwell to conduct throughout the concert. He retired, carrying everybody's sympathy and wishes for quick recovery, and his place was taken by Mr. Frank Bridge. N.

LONDON STRING QUARTET

On December 8, the London String Quartet (Messrs. J. Levey, T. Petre, H. Waldo Warner, and Warwick-Evans) began, at Æolian Hall, a Beethoven Festival which occupied the whole week, all the Quartets being performed in chronological order. The scheme is, of course, not new; but it is obviously popular, and it certainly shows in the best light the finer qualities of the London players. Their strong point is the ensemble, and ensemble plays a far more important part in Beethoven than in the moderns whose rhythmic and harmonic licence opens the door for the widest liberty, or in the music of his predecessors, who frequently thrust the chief burden on to the leader. Individually, they are all excellent players, even though their style is not in any way homogeneous. The leader, Mr. Levey, is specially admirable in the quick runs which abound in the slow movements of Beethoven, and which he plays with consummate ease. Mr. Petre—his second—on the other hand, possesses unusual qualifications for his position. He can be trusted to efface himself at the right moment, momentarily to take the lead in announcing a subject, or to follow the slightest change of colour in the leading part with sympathy and intelligence. The violist, Mr. Warner, is inclined to be a trifle reticent at times. Of course he pulls his weight, as the saying is, and his taste never errs. But the first Bohemian Quartet, which owed much of its success to the virile energy of its violist, M. Nebdal, showed, years ago, that even in Beethoven the inner parts can occasionally become prominent with distinct gain. The fourth member of the Quartet, Mr. Warwick-Evans, is the best of our 'cellists, and this is not little, for Miss Harrison, Mr. Cedric Sharpe, Mr. Arnold Trowell, and Mr. Felix Salmond, form a quartet which would well stand comparison with any other champions from abroad.

The actual interpretation need not be discussed now, since this was, I believe, the third Beethoven Festival which the London String Quartet has given us. If memory can be trusted, audiences were more numerous on previous occasions, owing no doubt to the fact that the present Festival was held during the week when fog played havoc with concert audiences. BRITISH EMPIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL

A concert with the above description was given at the Albert Hall on December 10. The organizer was Mrs. Ernest Bigland. Dame Clara Butt and other celebrated artists sang. An orchestra of women, conducted by Miss Gwynne Kimpton, played. It was a foggy night, and the Albert Hall does not often house so scanty an audience. It was a curious audience, insusceptible to the orchestral music, but easily touched by the singers. If the occasion truly represented the musical efforts by the British Empire, we should have to admit that 'Lo! here the gentle lark' (imperfectly performed) was of all music the most preferred by an Imperial assembly. It was, of course, nothing of the sort. The words 'British Empire' are at anyone's disposal. A fraudulent mining company can adopt them in its name, and so can a street seller of ice-cream.

This was the third of the dreary and disorganized concerts given under this name at the Albert Hall. The institution also distributes medals to composers, awarded by eminent personages. Considering what some of the medal-winning music was like, the reputable medallists can hardly be proud of their distinctions. Not that all the evening's music was bad—far from it. The programme opened with Dr. Vaughan Williams's 'Wasps' Overture. Mr. Robert Radford was announced to sing songs of Stanford and Wallace, and Dame Clara Butt the 'Chrysilla' of Dame Ethel Smyth. The second part of the programme, which one was not able to stay for—if it progressed at the same rate as the first part it must have lasted till midnight—included Walton O'Donnell's 'Gaelic Rhapsody,' for military band, which has often been admired in recent months.

But the planning of this evening's music, the jumbling of good and bad, and the atmosphere—something between a political bazaar and a ballad concert—were all hostile to the good of the art. One of the prizes of this bran-pie of a concert was to have been Thomas F. Dunhill's Symphony in A minor. But owing to pressure of time all but the first movement was cut out of the programme. And even this remaining movement was indifferently played, so we still await an occasion for hearing properly what is a finely musicianly work.

And what strange things—O Muses!—thus pressed into the space. There was, for instance, a 'British Miniature Pianoforte Concerto,' by Miss P. Norman Parker. Well, shorn of its ridiculous title and of a truly impayable programme note which professed that the various phases of 'British character' were to be found depicted in this glib piece of average student work, it might have figured in the annual orchestral programme of one of our minor schools of music. It had no sort of claim to be heard by the general public. Some of the medal-winning songs were the most ordinary of pot-boilers. And when the British Empire in all its majesty and might takes to running a musical festival, it might impress on leading vocalists that the applause of less than one per cent. of an audience is not decently to be considered as an invitation for an encore. No; we have had reason before to suspect musical enterprises which make too loud protestation of patriotic or imperial motives, and this is no exception.

This language may seem strong, but experience of three of these much-boomed 'festivals' convinces one that, run as at present, they cannot do the art of music any good. C.

GERALD COOPER'S CONCERTS

Mr. Gerald Cooper deserves well of the community for the exceedingly engaging set of concerts he gave at Æolian Hall, Nos. 2 and 3 of which were on November 21 and December 5. But precisely such merits as his are those the community most easily overlooks, and the rare and delightful things were heard by small gatherings. Miss Marjorie Hayward led the instruments in little-known chamber music of Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven—Sonata for violin and flute, Flute Quartet, and the third String Trio in G (which contains movements not inferior to some of the early quartet movements of Beethoven). And between, Miss Megan Foster sang—with most apt daintiness in some Elizabethan pieces, but in Rameau with not all the technical brio wanted.

At the next of the set, Mr. Anthony Bernard conducted the London Chamber Orchestra, and we had some Corelli, Bach, and Haydn (Symphony No. 34, in D) on very much the scale for which it was meant. It all made one want for it a word like 'genteel' or 'gentlemanly,' only with the nicest possible signification. Especially did Haydn sparkle and disport himself—free and even bold, and so perfectly well-bred all the time. Miss Dorothy Helmrich sang, and Mr. Gerald Cooper, of course, was at the harpsichord. C.

BRITISH WOMEN'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Some of the orchestras will not, it seems, admit women, no matter how well they can play. Well, the women have retaliated. They have made up an orchestra which shall be independent of men. But there is no ill-feeling—no 'sex warfare'—about it, and the proof was that at the first of the new symphony concerts of the band (Queen's Hall, December 3) it admitted a male soloist, M. Alfred Cortôt, much as the exclusively male Hallé Orchestra may engage a Suggia or a d'Aranyi as soloist.

The women also admitted men's music. There were Overtures of Beethoven and Weber, and the D major Symphony of Brahms, all given under the stick of Miss Gwynne Kimpton. The upper strings were numerous and capable. Double-basses were few and rather weak. As for the wind, women have apparently not yet taken to those coy and elusive instruments long enough to have won their obedience. They were often shy and restless in the hands of their new feminine captors. Some would not speak up at the appropriate moment, others seemed bent on bolting back to their native woodlands (the horns particularly). If we have heard better performances of the Symphony from mere amateurs, that is not to say we are anything but hopeful over the future of the orchestra when it has had the thoroughly gruelling drilling which is clearly the first need of its slipshod youth. There is no reason why women, who master the violin and the pianoforte, should not do as well with any other instruments, and considering the enormously greater number of women than men who now take to the practice of music, all-women orchestras may well be a commonplace of the future. Meanwhile, Miss Kimpton and her friends have a lot to learn.

Not all the music was by men. M. Cortôt played in a Pianoforte Concerto by Mlle. Germaine Taillefère, which caused a sympathetic ripple, increasing to a splash when the young composer was found to be in the house. Then we had one of the movements over again, and this was nothing to regret, for the Concerto is nice and brief music, quite unpretentious and quite neatly pieced together. C.

A HARPIST FROM MOSCOW

Madame Marie Korchinski, who played the harp at Wigmore Hall on December 2, was announced as having come straight from the National Conservatorium at Moscow, and consequently we might be excused an extra hard look at one who knew that mysterious closed world of Muscovy —as unknown now, almost, as it was to the Elizabethans. But this accomplished, an elegant young woman bore no sign of having come farther than from Putney.

She brought no examples of the new Russian school of composition of which vague rumours now and then reach us, but she brought a harp, and played on it with virtuosity and an exceptionally full tone. This tone was good enough to make transcriptions of Scarlatti, and even of Debussy, very acceptable: but Chopin on the harp (she gave us the C sharp minor Impromptu) is but a travesty. The concert was not all harp, a disposal much to the credit of the player's good sense. She called in Mr. C. Kony (flautist) and Mr. Raymond Jeremy (violist) to vary the monotony of her poetic instrument, and they joined in the rarely heard Sonata of Debussy for those three instruments—one of the latest of his compositions, and one that seems to speak of lassitude and la destroyed serenity. C.

SOME SINGERS OF THE MONTH

Galli-Curci has been and gone. What has she taken away? A tremendous haul of English currency—enough, no doubt, to subsidise a symphonic orchestra, if not an opera company. What has she left behind? A curious reputation—as mixed and undecided a reputation as that of any important performer one can recall, for no two persons agree over her merits or her status.

These disagreements and controversies are my excuse for going back to this much-talked-of young woman. On December 14, at her last concert at the Albert Hall, she sang on the whole better than before, and though there was nothing to cause much modification in previous opinions, one felt this time at liberty to make up his mind fully without fear of undue harshness.

Well, it is undoubtedly one of the great voices of the world to-day. To deny this seems to me as absurd as to over-rate Galli-Curci as a technician or interpretative artist. It is not a 'white' voice in the pejorative sense. She is not one of the Italian singers whose song is all vowels, though certainly she does not give the consonants much of a chance, and this invalidates her German singing. May I say that it is rather a cream-coloured than a 'white' voice?

To one appreciative of technical finesses, her easy diction in such things as Rossini's tarantella, 'La Danza,' and the Spanish ditties by which she has won so much applause, is a rare pleasure. It proves a tongue entirely unhampered by any wrong muscular effort, and this is a good deal of the basis of sound vocal technics.

Against this it has to be admitted that she is apparently not interested to any depth in diction, and the words may go (if I may say so) 'hang' if they happen not to chime in with her prime consideration of tone, and the production of a limpid, easy-flowing Italian style. Many have been disappointed with Galli-Curci, and some most unjustifiably—having expected to be moved by her in a way entirely foreign to the effects of any coloratura soprano's art—but I think that the chief cause of Londoners' disappointment was not the quality of the voice, but the monotony of the use she made of it.

She is not a versatile singer. It is true that she will put down Donizetti and Wolf cheek by jowl on her programmes, but that does not mean that she is going to alter a true Donizetti style for a true Wolf style—no, she turns out both à la Galli-Curci, in the same indolent way.

Her singing lacks relief, it lacks punctuation. There is a lack of buoyant vitality. She sounds glib, but she is a woman of frail build, and under her apparent facility there is probably a heavy physical tax. This is, in fact, continually being proved by her mannerism of clipping short the ends of her phrases as though she were bankrupt of supply. And when a sustained effort was asked for to build up a climax, often the voice sadly wavered. Often she misjudged her means, holding too long to a showy, penultimate note, only to drop to a toneless or out-of-tune final.

She does herself wrong to sing in the Albert Hall. It is not a voice for that space—it is not round or full enough. Its charm tells properly in a small space, and hence the excellence of her gramophone records. At the final concert one did not notice so much of her mannerism of 'pecking' at low-to-high intervals — a mannerism disastrous to intonation. An unmitigated fault lay in her scale-passages, which she ran up and down with the jaw (so to speak) in full pursuit. The result was all sorts of different 'ah's'—fat ones, thin ones, and 'ah's' that had turned into 'ooh's.'

She does not sing well in German, French, or English, for she has made no effort to adapt herself to the idiosyncrasies of these languages—in so far as they are not Italian, the worse for them! In Wolf's 'Verborgenheit' there was a flow of sweet tone, but as an interpretation of the song it was ridiculously poor. On the other hand, 'Una voce' has not for long been so beautifully sung, and in this there is probably not a living singer to rival Galli-Curci. Perhaps when Galli-Curci next comes to England she will have put in some hard work at the technics of singing, and cured her present indiscipline. Then we shall have some singing, indeed!

Emerson once said of an Englishman's elocution that it was 'stomachic.' Nothing could be more true of Madame Kirkby Lunn's singing in the sense that the term suggests body and bigness. It was easy to realise the other day at her Wigmore Hall recital how she once held her own with the great Continental singers in Covent Garden's palmy days. Her tone does not merely 'cut' through by force of an excessive dental concentration. It is so deep set that it always has a fine importance. Unlike practically every other English contralto of the day, Madame Kirkby Lunn does not advertise changes of vocal gear when going uphill. She knows with the motorist that such clumsy tactics are bad for the works. She glides easily from note to note—without slurring—and displays a care in knitting together her phrases that other singers might well imitate. Her singing is all so splendidly unruffled. Again this singer judiciously estimates the relationship between tone and verbal sense. And far less than on some other occasions of late did Madame Kirkby Lunn this time indulge in 'scooping.' Astonishingly effective were her turns, stressings, and staccato. The admirable programme gave us much Brahms and Schubert.

A tenor, Signor Rangoni, who sang at Wigmore Hall, is still callow, but so have been many eminent Italians of his type at the beginning. There is a great deal to be said for this young dramatic singer, but he has to do much more solid work. We had at any rate the comforting conviction that Signor Rangoni is on the right track. Of few of our own adolescent singers can this be fairly said.

The best feature of Miss Jean Starr Untermeyer's recital at Æolian Hall was the composition of her programme. It was a pity that better vocal technics did not go hand in hand with such tastefulness. She sang alternate groups of Schubert and Wolf—the latter was represented by five songs from the Spanish book and a group of four of the 'Möricke' songs. Miss Untermeyer must have heard Gerhardt sing fairly often, and seems to have modelled her style on that singer. Her singing lacked lustre. There was too much of Gerhardt's sentimental tendency and close attention to verbal detail. But Gerhardt never loses the broader meaning of her songs, however she stoops to make fine points, whereas Miss Untermeyer seemed to be toiling on phrase by phrase, or even word by word.

From the beauty of her high notes and—in her happiest moments—the appealing naturalness of her middle register, one quite well saw why Miss Freda Wilson (Æolian Hall) wished to give a recital. Whether the time was ripe is another matter, for this singer had but little real interpretative grip, and she was too apt to confuse the flow of her tone by wrongly-produced vowels. She found it hard to sing with a flexible jaw, and both tone and diction as a consequence were lacking in a proper dignity.

Miss Joan Elwes proved herself a singer of uncommonly musical intentions at her Bach concert (Wigmore Hall, November 20), and this was followed by a mixed recital also containing a number of good things. Of Bach she sang the 'Spring Cantata' and arias from several other cantatas, some of them too little known. Her feeling for the music was evident, and that she was genuinely musical the dovetailing of her part showed. Miss Elwes's tone is bright, but it struck one that this brightness is won rather at the expense of roundness, and that a full opening of the throat is not at present her principal care. The arias of Verdi and Weber at the second concert were the sort of music that shows at once a temporising with the fundamental principles of singing. H. J. K.

CHORAL CONCERTS

Because the London public has no affection for Beethoven's Mass in D, a choir must needs have courage and devotion to give it performance. These were the qualities for which the London Choral Society and Mr. Arthur Fagge won praise on November 26, at Queen's Hall. A choir with so restless a programme as this, and no abnormal means for intensive rehearsal, cannot throw in with its other work an intimate, revealing performance of the Mass in D. Sufficient that the London Choral Society and the London Symphony Orchestra gave us an occasion to re-assess the work through the ear, so that those who thought it greater than Bach's Mass in B minor could renew their faith, and those who found it unconvincing could decide to remain unconvinced. The solo singers were Miss Elsie Suddaby, Miss Lillian Berger, Mr. John Collett, and Mr. Kenneth Ellis. Miss Berger set the best example of singing, but none of them knew the music as our Elijahs know their Elijah music, or our Angels theirs. This was, of course, not entirely the singers' fault. The Mass was preceded by Bach's Motet 'God's time is the best.'

The Mass in B minor was given on November 29 by the Philharmonic Choir at Central Hall, Mr. C. Kennedy Scott conducting. School-children were invited to hear it, and they came in great numbers. The performance was in everything a repetition of that given at Queen's Hall on November 13.

The Civil Service Choir, under Mr. Rutland Boughton, had a notable programme for its concert at Central Hall on December 4. Of staple music it contained Bach's 'Sleepers, wake' (three times this work comes into the month's review of musical events in London) and Parry's 'Jerusalem.' The unfamiliar items were Alec Rowley's 'The Leaves of Life,' for baritone solo and female chorus—well written and of melodic quality; Mr. Boughton's Motet 'The City' and male-voice choruses 'The Blacksmith' and 'Quick March'; 'The three jovial huntsmen,' by Sir Walford Davies; also four Sea Shanties in Sir Richard Terry's arrangement. The audience was invited to join in these, and in 'Jerusalem.' The instrumental 'relief' was Mozart's Oboe Quartet—a bright idea!

The Westminster Choral Society, which seems to have given up the speculation of modern cantatas for the certainties of the old, put Bach's 'I wrestle and pray' and 'Be not afraid' into its programme at Central Hall on December 10. Mr. Vincent Thomas showed himself a true choral expert.

In the suburbs the event of the season has been the performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius,' given by Croydon Symphony Orchestra and Philharmonic Society on November 22. Mr. Alan Kirby fully justified his ambition, and conducted a performance that went far beyond expectation. Mr. John Coates was Gerontius. Dulwich Philharmonic Society, under Mr. Arthur Fagge, was heard in 'The Golden Legend' on December 3, in Dulwich Baths Hall. On December 6 choral music was to be heard at the extremes of London—'Hiawatha' at the Alexandra Palace, under Mr. Allen Gill; 'Merrie England' at the Crystal Palace, under Mr. W. W. Hedgcock; Stanford's 'Ave atque vale,' and David's 'The Desert,' by the Ealing Philharmonic Society, under Mr. A. C. Praeger.

Hither Green Choral and Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Ernest Dumayne, had the following excellent programme for its concert on December 11: Stanford's 'Songs of the Sea' (Mr. Joseph Farrington), Mendelssohn's G minor Pianoforte Concerto (Mr. B. Martin), Bridge's 'The Flag of England,' and Vaughan Williams's 'Toward the Unknown Region.' N.

The Christmas concert of the Oriana Choir brought together the customary wealth of old and new, unfamiliar and homely. The Choir was not in its best form during the earlier half of the programme. An almost persistent tremolo among the sopranos was out of place in the Palestrina 'Ave Maria' (is it ever in place in choral singing?), and spoilt the tuning as well as the spirit of the piece; and in the 'Coventry Carol' the altos flattened badly. The Choir recovered its form with the modern works in the second half, and sang delightfully, especially in some Holst and Vaughan Williams items.

CONCERTS IN CHURCHES

THE TUDOR SINGERS

The Tudor Singers, at St. Alban's, Holborn, on December 16, gave a recital of 'sacred mediæval music,' but most of it, so far from being in the least bit mediæval, was pure 16th-century polyphony, including a good part of Byrd's five-part Mass and some splendid Motets of his. The 16th-century Fleming, Kerle, was described on the programme as '14th-century.' Some Weelkes, Morley, Gibbons, Prætorius, and Palestrina was also sung, and the moderns Rooper and Holst were admitted into this august company. The singers were a party of ten, and while their tone admits considerably of improvement, one wished them well and hoped they would carry far and wide such a good work. The church was full.

BAX AND VAUGHAN WILLIAMS AT SOUTHWARK CATHEDRAL

Southwark Cathedral is nowadays well known as a haven for good music. The Christmas service which Mr. E. T. Cook conducted there on December 13 was admirably composed. Is not this in effect a faultless combination of new and old, familiar and unfamiliar?:

Bach: Cantata, 'Sleepers, wake!'
Mozart: G minor Symphony.
Bax: Carol, 'Of a rose I sing.'
Vaughan Williams: 'Fantasia on Christmas Carols.'

Mr. Bax's difficult and esoteric piece grows on one. It was singularly well managed by Mr. Cook's choir. Its high ornateness was well contrasted with the rustic frankness of Dr. Vaughan Williams's ever-delightful Fantasia.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS'S MASS AT THE ABBEY

The Westminster Abbey Special Choir performed a distinguished service to music in singing, at the Abbey on the evening of December 15, Dr. Vaughan Williams's Mass in G minor, for unaccompanied double chorus and solo quartet. Mr. Sydney H. Nicholson conducted.

It is strange that this Mass has been so little heard. A Wolverhampton choir sang it at Queen's Hall, and it was given at Westminster Cathedral towards the end of Sir Richard Terry's regimen. This time we had a wonderfully beautiful performance, and one of the effects of it should be to incite other choirs to tread the way of this strange and remote but inspiring music.

It is one of the most complete expressions of the later phase of Dr. Vaughan Williams's art. While it is to some extent, no doubt, the result of his studies of Tudor music, nothing could be more preposterous than to represent it as being a pasticcio in the 16th-century manner. Perhaps it was to show the absurdity of this suggestion (which was lightly put forth in various quarters when the Mass was first sung) that the Westminster Choir sang between the Gloria and the Credo a Motet 'O Beata et gloriosa Trinitas,' of Palestrina, a composition of truly angelical suavity. Compared with the sunny harmonies of its construction, the modern Englishman's work suggested the grey and craglike edifices of Northern Gothic.

The Mass is a mine of technical interest, and may be counted on to influence deeply such young men of to-day as aspire to compose devotional music which shall be devotional not merely in name but also in substance. The general effect is of a very great and noble austerity. Someone said that not since the Abbey was a relatively new building can it have heard within half-an-hour so many consecutive fifths. The sure art of Dr. Vaughan Williams's use of progressions which clumsy writing can make repellent, is a matter of interest to all intelligent musicians. The entire work consists only of common chords.

It is hardly necessary to say that the mode of expression is as far as can be removed from the romantic or theatrical. Within its chosen sphere—that is, of pure liturgical service—its expressiveness is deep and intense. The Kyrie in its grave beauty is masterly. The end of the Gloria brings a succession of Amens that have a suggestion of bells pealing. In the Credo, as elsewhere, there are to be heard amid the keen winds of this polyphony the passage of folk-song shapes, completely reverent, of course, and only dimly enough discerned, but giving the imagination a hint, with a thought of the humble multitudes whose faith is being declared. The Agnus Dei affords the most touching moment of personal devotion in the whole. The prayer for mercy, with its antiphonal repetitions at a minor third higher, verge on the plaint or the cry.

The Choir had mastered the work and gave us singing of an extreme beauty. It was preceded by Dr. Vaughan Williams's 'Three Preludes on Welsh Hymn-Tunes,' played by an anonymous organist. Dr. Alan Gray's Motet, 'Dixit Dominus,' was also sung, an elaborate and urbane composition—Wren-like rather than Early English. The choir is inviting the adherence of honorary members in order to prosecute more energetically the good work it is doing.

BYRD'S 'GREAT' SERVICE

St. Margaret's, Westminster, was packed on November 25 when Dr. Whittaker brought his Newcastle Bach Choir to perform the recently-discovered 'Great' Service of Byrd. The choir, despite depletion of its ranks by influenza, sang finely. Their skill was shown above all in the (apparent) ease with which they overcame the rhythmical difficulties in which the work abounds, and in the certainty with which they sustained the pitch throughout. Of the music itself it is impossible to speak in a notice necessarily brief. It must be said, however, that the deep impression it made was manifest. What is to be the future of this great music? Obviously few church choirs can make it part of the repertory: it is too long, as well as too difficult. Here is an opening for the Provincial Festivals; and we should like to hear a portion of it—say, the 'Magnificat'—done by the Philharmonic and other London choirs.

It should be added that instrumental relief of a suitable kind was provided by Mr. Stanley Roper with some old English organ music; and that Mr. Herbert Dawson rounded off the occasion with a splendid performance of Bach's Passacagalia and Fugue.

H.G.

Despite the great interest now taken in Purcell, it is not easy to hear much of his music in public. Readers should therefore note that the League of Arts will devote two evenings to his music on January 5 and 8, in the Great Hall of the University of London (Imperial Institute Road, South Kensington). The choir, conducted by Mr. Geoffrey Shaw, will sing selections from the choral works, the Kendal String Quartet will play, and a ballet in costume will be given by the League Dancers. The concerts begin at 8.30.

One of the outstanding productions of the spring season will be that of Delius's 'Mass of Life' at the Philharmonic concert on April 2. The Philharmonic Choir needs extra voices (mainly tenors and basses) for the occasion. Good sight-readers who would like to take part in the performance of this little-known work should write to the hon. secretary, Mr. D. Ritson Smith, 70, Esmond Road, W.4.

EASTBOURNE FESTIVAL

The second musical Festival at Devonshire Park, Eastbourne, was best summed up by the critic who called it a 'nine days' wonder.' It gave a fairly comprehensive view of British music and musicians, besides attending to music in general, and it is no wonder that it took nine days. The designer and creator of the Festival was Capt. H. G. Amers, and it was the municipality which undertook the responsibility and organization.

Only a sketch of such activities can be given here. To begin with the conductors: these were Capt. Amers as conductor-in-general, Sir Edward Elgar, Prof. J. B. McEwen, Sir Landon Ronald, Mr. Adam Carse, Mr. H. Coleridge-Taylor, Sir Dan Godfrey, Mr. Norman O'Neill, Mr. John Ireland, Mr. Armstrong Gibbs, Dame Ethel Smyth, Mr. Frank Bridge, Mr. Alexander Brent-Smith, Mr. Edward German, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Prof. Granville Bantock, Dr. R. Vaughan Williams, and Sir Henry Wood. Those in the list who are composers were there to conduct works of their own.

Here are the first two programmes:

Friday, November 21

'The Land of the Mountain and the Flood' ... ... Hamish MacCunn
'Solway'—a Symphony ... ... McEwen.
Violoncello Concerto ... ... Elgar
Miss Beatrice Harrison
'Enigma' Variations ... ... Elgar

Saturday, November 22

Overture, 'Hansel and Gretel' ... ... Humperdinck
Miniature Suite—'Boulogne' ... ... Adam Carse
Madrigals, Ballets, Folk-Songs
The English Singers
Symphony No. 2, in E minor ... ... Rachmaninov
Suite, 'L'Arlésienne' ... ... Bizet—Ronald Ballet Music, 'Hiawatha' ... Coleridge-Taylor
Two Operatic Excerpts Rutland Boughton and Rimsky-Korsakov

Every programme had its special work, or more than one. These are some of the special features: the 'Royal Fireworks' Suite, arranged by Hamilton Harty, from Handel; 'Crossings,' by Armstrong Gibbs; John Ireland's 'Symphonic Rhapsody'; a Phantasy Suite by Maurice Besly; Mr. Victor Watson in a Handel-Lotter Concerto for double-bass; Frank Bridge's 'Summer'; the first performance of A. Brent-Smith's Symphonic Studies on a theme by Farnaby; Edward German's 'Theme and Six Diversions'; Bantock's 'Hebridean' Symphony; 'Old King Cole' Ballet Suite by Vaughan Williams; Holst's 'St. Paul's' Suite.

On November 27 the Festival Choir sang Mackenzie's 'The Dream of Jubal' under the composer's direction. This Choir is composed of the Eastbourne Choral Union (Mr. James R. Dear), the Eastbourne Choral Society (Mr. Francis J. Foote), and the Municipal Chorus (Capt. Amers). The performance pleased everybody, especially those who were aware that the common neglect of 'The Dream of Jubal' is only a freak of fashion and that the work would repay a kingdom-wide revival.

There were some well-known soloists to be heard at the Festival, among them John Goss, Myra Hess, Jelly d'Aranyi, Harriet Cohen, and Pablo Casals.

The orchestra of sixty, including a dozen amateur string players, achieved a triumph, and the members shared it with the musician whose responsibilities covered the whole of the rehearsing. This, his second Festival, makes Capt. Amers a power in the land.

The Title-page and Contents of Volume 65 (January to December, 1924) of the Musical Times will be ready early in January. Subscribers can obtain them post free on application to the Publishers.

Competition Festival Record

NORTH LONDON FESTIVAL

Among the successes of the North London Musical Festival just held was the part taken by infant and junior schools. Instead of appearing on the stage, the children tripped into the hall right among the audience, who were seated alongside the walls. The traditional type of game was not required; the modern singing game adopted was R. H. Macdonald's 'Will you walk a little faster?' Even more appealing was the charm of the infants when they sang and acted or danced the story of 'Cock-a-doodle-do.' Almost as numerous as on its introduction last year was the entry for girl guides' choirs, and Mr. Harvey Grace, massing the eight choirs together, produced an inspiriting effect. Quite new was a class for the singing of old English songs, at the choice of the competitors, from Dowland, Morley, Rosseter, Purcell, and others. One of the keenest contests was the open class for mixed choirs, who had to sing Byrd's 'Sing joyfully unto God' and Elgar's 'O wild west wind.' Sir Richard Terry, though deprecating 'stunt' singing as a rule, approved the realistic wind effect obtained by the Portsmouth Temperance Choral Union, which won the Daily Telegraph Shield. The open class for men's choirs had a difficult task set in Percy E. Fletcher's 'The Vision of Belshazzar,' but this was ably surmounted by a choir from Chatham, conducted by Mr. Leslie Mackay. Both classes for ladies' choirs were won by Madame Elsie Wood's Choir from Muswell Hill. No less than seven competitions were held for secondary and elementary school choirs. There was also keen competition by string orchestras, the senior honours going to Mr. Victor Duane's Orchestra from Watford. In the various solo classes there were over fourteen hundred entries, placing this Festival high in the list of large events, though it was not a record year in that respect. The standard, however, put the Festival on a high plane. Ten adjudicators were engaged day and evening in two halls during the eight days of the competitions.

THE SOUTHERN AREA (LONDON) FESTIVAL

This Festival concluded its third season on November 29, at Wandsworth Town Hall. There were 75 classes, and a total of 13,000 entries (including 32 choirs and bands), an increase of twenty per cent. on the previous year.

The competitions occupied eight days, and the principal results were as follows: Daily Telegraph Shield for Choral Societies, Suburban Madrigal Society (Mr. Samuel Dyson); Ladies' Choirs, Sheen School of Music (Miss Edith Hays); Chorus of equal voices (senior), Beulah House High School, Balham (Miss Dorothy Shareman); School orchestras, Albert Bridge Violin School, Battersea (Miss G. Elston); Gold medal classes for Soloists, Miss Emily Gardner and Mr. Henry Hassell (vocalists) and Miss Muriel Henniker (pianist). The secretary of the Festival (Mrs. Lester Jones) informs us that a 'copper' collection for the Vocal Therapy Society funds realised £7 17*s.* 6*d.* This Society exists for scientific remedial vocal treatment to nerve-shattered and shell-shocked soldiers.

MILLOM.—Excellent choral singing, both mixed- and male-voice, was the feature of this year's Festival, two choirs from Millom and two from Barrow having a rare tussle for supremacy in their respective classes—the home teams winning by the narrowest of margins. Instrumental classes were small, but unusually promising; vocal soloists strong in numbers, and showing excellent material, but most of it in the rough stage. A packed house heard the long evening session, and the executive and public of this little Cumberland town are to be congratulated on a Festival so good chorally as to justify one of the speakers calling it a 'pocket Blackpool.'

NORTHAMPTON. — The old-established Sunday School Union Eisteddfod threw its classes open this year, with good result in the solo classes. The poorness of the response by choirs seems to suggest that the date—December 3-6—runs too near to concerts given by various bodies just before the Christmas season. Certainly there were many counter-attractions, and these, with persistent rain, played havoc with the attendances. The outstanding feature was the notable improvement of standard in the instrumental classes—pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. These were so good, and so many of the players were local, that it ought to be possible to include next year classes for such chamber music as violin and pianoforte sonatas, and pianoforte trio. The sooner these players get together in twos and threes, the nearer comes the day when there may be a class for stringed orchestras. Another feature worth mentioning is the unusually large proportion of boys and lads among the instrumentalists; and, on the whole, they showed better form than the girls.

An excellent programme was announced for the concert, on December 19, in connection with the Kensington Festival. The combined choirs, twelve in number, were down to sing Bach's 'Sleepers, wake' and the Chorale, 'Jesu, Joy of man's desiring,' and traditional carols arranged by Vaughan Williams and Holst. The soloists were Miss Flora Mann and Mr. George Hughes. An orchestra, drawn chiefly from Kensington amateurs, played some Haydn. Dr. Vaughan Williams conducted.

Music in the Provinces

BIRMINGHAM AND DISTRICT.—At a pianoforte and song recital given by Mr. Michael Mullinar and Mr. Charles Hedges, a new 'Toccata' by Holst was given its first performance in this city. The principal theme of the work is a Northumbrian pipe-tune, 'Newburn Lads.' The theme is treated in various ways, the piece working up to an exhilarating climax. Among his vocal items Mr. Charles Hedges included the 'So tanzen die Engel' and 'Du wunderliche Tove,' from Schönberg's 'Gurre-lieder.'——A work of Dittersdorf was played by the Catterall Quartet at the second concert of the series. It turned out to be no more than easy, pleasant music. Dohnányi's D flat Quartet and the third of Beethoven's 'Rasoumovsky' Quartets were also given.——The Broadcasting Station Orchestra, together with the City Choir, gave a performance of Rutland Boughton's 'Bethlehem' on December 3. The work loses its charm when given on the concert platform, though the singing of the Christmas carols was much enjoyed. Mr. Joseph Lewis conducted.——Supported by the same orchestra, Walsall Philharmonic Society performed Coleridge-Taylor's 'A Tale of Old Japan.'——The Philharmonic Pianoforte Quartet (Messrs. Paul Beard, Venton, Hock, and Kelly) gave a beautiful performance of Brahms's G minor Pianoforte Quartet.——At a meeting of the Birmingham Bach Society, on November 20, Purcell's 'King Arthur' was given, and a vocal quartet sang the Bach Chorale Prelude 'Deck thy soul with gladness,' arranged from the Organ Chorale Prelude by Mr. Bernard Jackson.——The first of a series of three concerts by the Arthur Hytch String Quartet was given on December 10. The Delius Quartet was the outstanding feature of the programme. Its beautiful wandering themes were given by the players with feeling and sincerity.

BLACKPOOL.—The programme of the Blackpool Choral and Orchestral Society's concert, under Mr. Percy M. Dayman's direction, on November 19, included Stanford's 'The Revenge,' 'The Blue Bird,' and 'Phaudrig Crohoore,' and an orchestral suite 'Simon de Montfort,' by Dr. F. H. Wood, who conducted it.

BRISTOL.—The 'Hiawatha' trilogy was performed by the Choral Society, on November 15, with orchestra, Mr. George Riseley conducting. The soloists were Miss Elsie Suddaby, Mr. John Perry, and Mr. Herbert Brown.——Kreisler and Mr. Charlton Keith were at Colston Hall on November 18.——On November 25, the Musical Club celebrated its majority by repeating the programme—Beethoven's Quartet in C minor and Dvorák's Pianoforte Quintet—with which it opened in 1903. The performers, too, were the same, with the exception of Mr. Best, the viola player.——Sir Landon Ronald was the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra's concert on December 3. The Symphonies were Schubert's 'Unfinished' and Tchaikovsky's fifth, and Miss Una Truman played Saint-Saëns's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor.——On November 28, at the children's concert, Mr. Maurice Alexander's Orchestra played a Gavotte and Bourrée of Bach, Schubert's 'Rosamunde' Overture, and some movements from the 'New World' Symphony.——At the Philharmonic Society's concert on December 6 in Colston Hall, Elgar's 'Polonia,' Frank Bridge's Suite, 'The Sea,' and the Prelude to Act 3 of 'Lohengrin' were played by the orchestra, which joined the choir in B. J. Dale's 'Before the paling of the stars' and Parry's 'Pied Piper of Hamelin,' with Mr. Norman Stone and Mr. Norman Notley as soloists. The English Singers sang madrigals and modern arrangements of folk-songs. Mr. Arnold Barter conducted.——Horfield Baptist Choral Society and Orchestra, numbering seventy, performed Wesley's 'The Wilderness,' Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' Handel's 'Water Music,' an eight-part choral piece by Peter Cornelius, and Walford Davies's 'Solemn Melody,' on December 10. Mr. E. G. Harris conducted.——On December 13 Fry's Musical Society (chorus and orchestra), numbering two hundred, performed Frederick Bridge's 'The Flag of England,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'Sea-drift,' Fletcher's 'For Empire and King,' and Parry's 'Jerusalem.' Fletcher's 'Woodland Pictures' and a selection from 'Mignon' were played by the orchestra. Mr. Charles Reed conducted, and the soloists were Mrs. E. Cadbury and Mr. P. G. Featherstone.——Miss Frieda Hempel gave a recital in Colston Hall on December 12.——On December 11 pupils and friends of the Grammar School formed a chorus and orchestra for Barnett's 'The Ancient Mariner,' Balfour Gardiner's 'Cargoes,' and some folk-songs and Negro spirituals, Mr. C. W. Stear conducting.

CARLISLE.—The Choral Society opened its season with a performance of Verdi's 'Requiem,' under the direction of Dr. F. W. Wadely. Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony completed the programme.

CHELMSFORD.—The Choral Society, conducted by Mr. F. E. Swan and assisted by an orchestra, performed 'The Martyr of Antioch' on December 9. The soloists were Miss Maude Willby, Miss Lily Clare, Mr. David Ellis, and Mr. Edward Dykes.

COLCHESTER.—'Elijah' was given by Colchester and District Musical Society on December 11, under the direction of Mr. F. W. Kingdon.

CROSS HILLS.—Hubert Bath's 'The Wake of O'Connor' and the concert version of Gounod's 'Faust' were given by Cross Hills Choral Union on November 29, Mr. Clement Waddington conducting.

EXETER.—At the Chamber Music Club's meeting on November 19, Geoffrey Shaw's 'Six Shakespeare Songs' for eight voices and pianoforte were performed.——On November 19, Mr. Reginal Rudd, Miss Phyllis Smith, and Miss Daisy Hoult played a 'Serenade' for pianoforte trio by Gustave Robert, Arnold Trowell's 'Nocturne' for 'cello and pianoforte, and Mr. Veysey sang Dr. Bullock's 'I love my God and He loves me.'——The Oratorio Society, conducted by Mr. Allan Allen, performed 'King Olaf' and Stanford's 'Songs of the Sea,' with full orchestra, and two Elgar part-songs unaccompanied ('Serenade' and 'Love's Tempest'), on December 2, in the Civic Hall.——On December 10 members of the Chamber Music Club performed Byrd's second Fantasia for string sextet, Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio in D major, and madrigals by Benet, Weelkes, and Farnaby.——The String Orchestra, organized by Mr. Edward Petherick, and conducted by Mr. A. J. James, played three movements by Bach, a Suite by Frank Bridge, a Petite Suite for pianoforte and orchestra (with Miss Dorothy Hoskin as soloist), and an Air de Ballet by Percy Pitt, on December 11, at the Civic Hall.

EXMOUTH.—On December 3, in the Church Institute, the Choral Society performed 'The Banner of St. George' and 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast,' with orchestra, under Mr. Raymond Wilmot. The orchestra played 'Finlandia.'

FELIXSTOWE.—On December 9 the Choral Society and an orchestra performed the 'Hiawatha' trilogy, under Mr. Maurice Vinden's direction.

GUILDFORD.—The high standard of music at Guildford has been maintained throughout the autumn season, and culminated in December in a very good performance of Walford Davies's 'Everyman.' Guildford Choral Society and Guildford Symphony Orchestra were capably directed by Capt. Claud Powell, and the part of Everyman was sung by Mr. Thorpe Bates.

HERTFORD.—Stanford's 'Phaudrig Crohoore' was given by East Herts Musical Society on November 20, Mr. W. J. Comley conducting. Mr. John Goss sang, and the choir was also heard in Morley's 'Now is the month of maying,' Gibbons's 'The Silver Swan,' Elgar's 'Weary wind of the west,' and other madrigals and part-songs.

HULL.—Sir Henry Wood conducted Hull Philharmonic Society on November 27 in Borodin's second Symphony, Bizet's 'L'Arlésienne,' and other works.——Kreisler and Backhaus have recently visited the city.

IPSWICH.—At the Municipal concert on November 19, Miss Gwynn Damant and Mr. Henry Butcher were the singers, Mr. Lewin Taylor played the 'Cello Sonata in F, by Galliard, Mr. E. A. Collins was at the organ, and Mr. A. H. Welburn gave explanatory remarks.——The Cecilia Orchestral Society, on November 23, played Suppé's Overture, 'Morning, Noon, and Night.'——On November 26, the Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Edgar R. Wilby, played the 'New World' Symphony, Bizet's 'L'Arlésienne' Suite, and a Suite for strings by S. Spain-Dunk.

KEIGHLEY.—The new Keighley and District Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Charles Stott, opened its first season very successfully with 'Elijah' on December 9. The Choir and the Bradford Permanent Orchestra made a force of two hundred, and a well-prepared performance was given.

LEEDS.—The Philharmonic Society, under Dr. Bairstow, gave a Vaughan Williams concert on November 19, with the help of Leeds Symphony Orchestra. The works chosen were the 'Sea' Symphony, the Overture to 'The Wasps,' and a selection of songs.——Bach's 'Christmas' Oratorio was given by Leeds New Choral Society on December 10, under Dr. C. H. Moody. A string orchestra led by Mr. Edward Maude assisted.——A festival of chamber music was given by the London String Quartet during the week November 24-29. The programme covered practically the whole ground of the string quartet. British composers were represented by Howells and McEwen.——The B.N.O.C. opened a fortnight's season at the Grand Theatre on December 1, the first opera being 'Hugh the Drover.'

LINCOLN.—The Musical Society, under Dr. G. J. Bennett, performed 'The Flying Dutchman' (omitting part of Act 1), on November 26, with Miss Florence Austral and Mr. Walter Hyde among the soloists, and an orchestra mainly of Hallé players from Manchester.

LIVERPOOL.—On November 15, the Welsh Choral Union performed 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' and a new work, 'Kynon,' by Mr. Hopkin Evans, the conductor, a setting of Milton's words for orchestra and choir. The principal singers were Miss Mair Jones, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. Peter Dawson. The orchestra played the 'Oberon' Overture and the Prelude from 'Tristan.'——Messrs. Thibaud and Solomon, at a violin and pianoforte recital in Philharmonic Hall, on November 15, played Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 30, No. 2.——At a concert of the Rodewald Society, the London String Quartet played Waldo Warner's Suite, 'The Pixy Ring.'——M. Pierre Monteux was the guest-conductor at the Philharmonic concert on November 17. The programme included Brahms's 'Tragic' Overture, the 'Fantasia on a Theme of Tallis,' by Vaughan Williams, Franck's 'Symphonic Variations,' 'Scheherazade,' and d'Indy's 'Istar.'——Miss Olga Law (violin), Mr. Fred W. Hague ('cello), and Miss Edith Byrom (pianoforte), played Ireland's 'Phantasie Trio' in Crane Hall, on November 19.——On November 22, at the third of Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper's orchestral concerts at Picton Hall, Miss Allen lectured on 'The Romance of the Scales.' Wagner's 'Faust' and 'Rienzi' Overtures, the Bohemian Dance from 'The Fair Maid of Perth,' and the March from 'Le Coq d'Or,' were played under Mr. Gordon Stuteley's direction.——The 'Consort of Viols,' formed under the direction of Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch, gave its first recital at Rushworth Hall on November 25. The music included a Fantasy in D, by John Jenkins, a 'Triumph air,' by Michael Este, a Suite by Matthew Locke, and two pieces by King Henry VIII.——On November 26, the Post Office Choral Society performed Elgar's 'The Light of Life,' with orchestra, and two part-songs by Brahms. Mr. Matthews Williams conducted, and the orchestra played the 'Prometheus' Overture.——The programme of the Philharmonic concert, on December 2, was mainly modern. Casals was the soloist in a Bach Suite in G for 'cello and strings and Boccherini's 'Cello Concerto in B flat. Bantock's 'The Pierrot of the Minute,' Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Mlada' Suite, Stravinsky's 'Firebird,' and some 'Fantastic Dances' by Turiña were performed by the orchestra, and the choir sang Bairstow's 'Where shall the lover rest?' Dr. A. W. Pollitt conducted the singers, and Sir Henry Wood the orchestra.——Recitals have been given by Kreisler, Madame Susan Metcalfe-Casals and M. Casals, Miss Hetty Bolton (pianoforte), and Miss Rose Myrtil (contralto).——On December 6, in Picton Hall, Mr. Gordon Stutely's Orchestra played Mozart's Symphony in G minor, a Mendelssohn Pianoforte Concerto, with Mr. Fred Brown as soloist, Elgar's 'Dream Children,' Haydn's 'Toy Symphony,' and Glinka's 'Kamarinskaya.'——The Catterall Quartet were the players at the Rodewald concert on December 8, and the works were César Franck's Quartet in D, Mr. Whitaker's 'Lancashire Sketches,' and Brahms's Quartet in B flat.——The Chamber Music Players (Miss Ethel Hobday, Mr. Albert Sammons, Mr. Lionel Tertis, and Mr. Cedric Sharpe) played to members of the British Music Society in Picton Hall on December 10. The Fauré Pianoforte Quartet in C and Rachmaninov's 'Cello Sonata were included.

LOWESTOFT.—At the Royal Hotel, on December 1, the Norfolk String Quartet (Mr. André Mangeot, Mr. Boris Pecker, Miss Audrey Alston, and Miss Edith Lake) played Beethoven and Haydn Quartets and a Sonatine for two violins by Honegger.

LYMINGTON.—Lymington and District Philharmonic Society, consisting of chorus and orchestra, performed Cowen's 'John Gilpin' and part-songs in the Lyric Theatre on December 4. With Mr. W. Hurford as baritone soloist, the male voices and orchestra also performed Stanford's 'Songs of the Sea.'

MANCHESTER.—The most conspicuous work done by Mr. Hamilton Harty since my last message has been in Elgar's Symphony No. 1 (revived after an interval of eight years) and in Brahms's No. 2, in D. Writing in these columns three years ago, I ventured to single out Hamilton Harty's Brahms Symphony readings as having all the elements of greatness. The past two seasons have afforded still further opportunities for testing the accuracy of this earlier forecast, and now that the numerical strength of the band approximates more nearly to the old Richter ideal, Hamilton Harty's work stands forth in its true proportions. The impetuous urge of his temperament is now under swift and responsive control. Balance in design and warmth of colour are everywhere discerned, which is perhaps only another way of saying that he and his players have completely assimilated the somewhat intractable elements in the Brahms symphonic idiom, and, now conscious of their complete mastery, they play as the four gospels according to Brahms with clear and penetrating insight. Towards the close of Richter's Manchester reign there was much controversy respecting the old tyrant's symphonic predilections: Beethoven he administered in such constant doses, but Brahms only rarely. Many in this part of the world find a delight in the gorgeous autumnal glow of Brahms's orchestral warmth, which yields a fuller æsthetic satisfaction than the barer, pure line of Beethoven. This is discernible, too, in our almost passionate attachment to Brahms in chamber work, in choral song, as well as in lieder, and not the least part of Hamilton Harty's satisfaction with the state of things during his reign here must have been found in the depth and very real quality of Brahms appreciation to-day. If the two Elgar Symphonies could have bestowed upon them an equal measure of preparation and performance, they would surely yield an equal harvest of appreciation, for they derive directly from the great Brahms tradition, and an adequate Brahms knowledge is in a very real sense the finest preparation for the later master. With one's present degree of knowledge, Hamilton Harty does not appear to be possessed to anything like the same degree as Richter or Landon Ronald with the rocky, bastion-like grandeur of the opening movement, which rises massively in its towering splendour, much as the north-west face of the Pillar Mountain does from the Ennerdale Valley. This feeling for the monumental in music is probably the rarest of all gifts bestowed by the gods. But Hamilton Harty's genius found its fullest expression in the Allegro molto of the second movement leading into the Adagio. Here the qualities which have so often animated his Strauss performances found vent, and the imaginative handling of the gradual decline from the vigour and impetuosity of the early pages of the second movement to the calm and solemn eloquence of the Adagio was beyond praise. As its hushed notes died away one asked what more appropriate music for Armistice commemoration could well be conceived.——The ninth Hallé concert brought to Harty the severest test he has yet undergone during his Manchester conductorship—the treatment of a programme almost entirely of Mozart. Richter imposed a weight and majesty of handling greater than the Mozart structure could often bear; Beecham showed us what excessive delicacy and superlatively fastidious rhythm lay concealed in every Mozart score, and yet in the stretches of symphonic grandeur his treatment broadened without losing its characteristic fastidious quality. The band in those days responded so swiftly to this method of handling that it seemed impossible it should ever lose this power, but after recent experience it must be confessed very ruefully that it has declined. Probably more (and not less) Mozart would be a wholesome corrective to all our judgments—conductors, bands, and general public alike.——Casals has been our most distinguished visitor, and Harty revealed one of his inspirations in programme-drafting by concluding a concert which had begun with the C major unaccompanied Suite of Bach, with the racy Dvorák 'Cello Concerto—very unorthodox, but very fine in the result.——The chief distinction in the chamber music concerts of the period under review was Madame Suggia's playing at the Bowdon concerts two days later than Casals's appearance at the Hallé. She also played the unaccompanied C major Suite of Bach, and all through her playing comparatively lacked warmth and her tone appeared less rich in quality. She brought some characteristically womanly touches to her Bach reading. Captain Heyner sang lieder and modern English song. After an abundant experience of vocal gymnastics at the hands of some international celebrities, recitals such as Captain Heyner's, Miss Astra Desmond's (mid-day Tuesdays), and John Coates's at the Harty Chamber concerts have been like dew in a parched land. Each of these three performers is a singer—the 'internationals' were rather vocal technicians. To the former poetry and music's emotional content were of paramount value, to the latter—what use is poetry, anyway? The musical world is big enough to find a public for both points of view.——The Co-operative Wholesale Society's male-voice choral concert on December 3 was the choir's first public appearance since its sensational singing at Blackpool Festival, the three tests by Elgar and Bantock finding as much favour here as at Blackpool.——The distinction which has come in recent weeks to the Hallé Orchestra wood-wind players has again been extended, the playing of Mr. Harry Mortimer, on November 19, in the Brahms E flat Clarinet Sonata, with Mr. Harty, and in the Mozart A major Concerto on December 11, placing him in the highest rank of wind players.

C. H.

MIDDLESBROUGH.—On November 26, the Musical Union, conducted by Mr. Gavin Kay, performed 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' and 'The Pied Piper.' The principal singers were Mr. Norman Stone and Mr. Keith Faulkner. The orchestra played works of Mozart and Beethoven.——The Permanent Orchestra, under Mr. Wilfred Briggs, played 'Die Meistersinger' Overture and instrumental episodes from 'Samson and Delilah,' at the Town Hall, on November 29.

NEWCASTLE.—The Oppenheim Musical Society gave its sixty-third concert in the Church Institute on November 27. Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet and an Octet in C major for strings, by Gardener, were the principal works in the programme.——On November 30, the Philharmonic Orchestra played Stanford's 'Irish Rhapsody,' César Franck's Symphony, a Northumberland small pipe tune, 'Noble Squire Dacre,' arranged by Dr. Whittaker, and the Bach Violin Concerto in E, with Mr. Alfred Wall as soloist. Mr. Edgar L. Bainton conducted.——In the Cathedral, on November 29, the Bach Choir sang Byrd's 'Great' Service, conducted by Dr. Whittaker. ——Recitals have been given by Mesdames Galli-Curci and Frieda Hempel, Mr. Archibald Armstrong (vocalist), Miss Olive Tomlinson (pianoforte), and Kreisler.——A recital of music by Tyneside composers was given on December 6 in the Church Institute by the British Music Society. The works included a Trio in B flat for pianoforte, violin, and viola, by Alfred M. Wall; a Sonata in D for pianoforte and 'cello by Edgar L. Bainton; a Nocturne for pianoforte, violin, and two voices, by George Dodds; 'Pictures in Three Moods,' for pianoforte, and three 'Songs of the Northern Roads,' by W. G. Whittaker; and a Quartet for strings by Arthur F. Milner.——On December 10 the Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Hamilton Harty, played Brahms's 'Academic Festival Overture,' Borodin's second Symphony, Respighi's Ancient Airs and Dances (the second Suite), and Beethoven's 'Emperor' Concerto, with Mr. Anderson Tyrer. Mr. George Dodds was the rehearsal conductor.

NORTHAMPTON.—The Musical Society gave one of the most successful concerts in its long career on December 5, when it performed Elgar's 'Caractacus' and Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens.' The soloists were Miss Maryan Elman, Mr. John Adams, Mr. Charles Knowles, and Mr. Leslie Bennett. Mr. Charles J. King conducted.

OXFORD.—On November 16, the G.W.R. Social and Educational Union gave a concert, at which the Caerphilly G.W.R. Male Choir of sixty voices sang 'The Crusaders' (Prothero), 'The Martyrs of the Arena' (de Rillé), 'I Delyn Aur' (Pugh Evans), and 'Cressir Anial' (Price). Mr. T. Rowland Davies conducted. —— On November 14, Miss Irene Scharrer gave a recital in the Masonic Hall.——In the Playhouse, on November 23, the Elizabethan Singers gave a costume recital. Included in a long programme were the Ayre for three voices, 'Ha, ha! this world doth pass,' a 'Freeman's Song,' Dowland's 'Weep no more' and 'Say, love, if ever thou didst find,' and two Canzonets—'I go before my darling' and 'When lo! by break of morning.'——On November 23 Brahms's 'Requiem' was performed in the Sheldonian Theatre by the Bach Choir and the Orchestral Society. The soloists were Miss Dorothy Silk and Mr. Frederick Ranalow, and Sir Hugh Allen conducted. —— On December 4, at the third Subscription concert in the Town Hall, the Orchestral Society (conducted by Mr. Guy Warrack) played Glinka's Overture, 'Russlan and Ludmilla,' Delius's 'On hearing the first cuckoo in spring,' and Brahms's first Symphony.——At the concert arranged by the City Police on December 3, 'Now is the month of Maying,' Harold Rhodes's quartet, 'I would I were the glow-worm,' Bennett's 'I love my Jean,' and Gibbons's 'Silver Swan' were sung.——In Queen's College Hall, on November 27, Eglesfield Musical Society, conducted by Mr. Reginald Jacques, performed Gluck's 'Orpheus,' with the Chamber Orchestra. The choir sang also Vaughan Williams's 'Just as the tide was flowing,' 'The springtime of the year,' and 'Wassail Song,' and choir and orchestra joined in Maurice Besly's 'Freights.'

PENRYN.—A Choral Society has been formed under the conductorship of the Rev. C. Daly-Atkinson.

PENZANCE.—In St. John's Hall, on November 28, the Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Walter Barnes, played the 'New World' Symphony, Mozart's Concerto for flute, harp, and strings, Holst's 'St. Paul's' Suite, and excerpts from Tchaikovsky's 'Eugène Onegin.'

PLYMOUTH.—Giving a concert on November 20 in conjunction with Dame Clara Butt, Mr. W. H. Squire, and Mlle. Aussenac, the Orpheus Male Choir sang 'When twilight dews' (David Parkes), 'Zut! Zut! Zut!' (Elgar), 'Dance of Gnomes' (MacDowell), 'The Phantom Host' (Hegar), and 'Invictus' (Prothero). Mr. David Parkes conducted.——In the Guildhall, on November 22, the string band of the R.M.L.I., conducted by Lieut. P. S. G. O'Donnell, played Lalo's Overture 'Le Roi d'Ys,' a suite, 'Mimes et ballerines,' by George Razigado, Boëllmann's 'Fantasie dialoguée' for organ and orchestra, with Mr. H. Moreton at the organ, and two 'Arabesques' of Debussy.——On November 26 the Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Walter Weekes, performed Mendelssohn's 'Scotch' Symphony, Borodin's 'Prince Igor' Overture, Cowen's Suite de Ballet, 'In Fairyland,' and Svendsen's 'Carnival in Paris.'——On the following day the Léner Quartet gave a concert under the auspices of the B.M.S.

READING.—A successful concert was given at the Town Hall on December 3 by the Berkshire Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. E. O. Daughtry. The music, which was greatly appreciated by a large audience, included Haydn's 'Clock' Symphony and Walford Davies's 'Solemn Melody.'

REDCAR.—'The Death of Minnehaha' was performed by the Musical Union on December 10, conducted by Mr. E. G. Robinson. The choir also sang part-songs, and the soloists were Miss Vera Morley and Mr. J. Olivers.

SCARBOROUGH.—An excellent list of carols and Christmas music, including Dr. Bairstow's 'The Blessed Virgin's Cradle Song,' was performed by the Scarborough Philharmonic Society on December 10. Miss Hilda Milvain conducted in the absence of Dr. Thomas Ely, who was indisposed.

SHEFFIELD.—Bach's 'Sleepers, wake' and Beethoven's Mass in D formed the programme of the Musical Union's concert on November 20. Both works were splendidly performed under Dr. Coward's direction.——Pianoforte Quartets by Mozart (G minor) and Schumann (E flat) were played at the University mid-day recital on November 27.

SHREWSBURY.—The Orchestral Society opened its season on November 26 with Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony and the Saint-Saëns B minor Violin Concerto, played by Mr. Melsa. Mr. Fred Morris conducted the orchestra for the first time.——The Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. F. G. Rowland, performed 'The Dream of Gerontius' on December 4 before a large audience.

SOUTHAMPTON.—The Kersey String Quartet (Miss Eda Kersey, Miss Rosalie Kersey, Mr. J. C. Kersey, and Mr. C. E. Horton) were the performers at the first invitation chamber concert on November 14, organized by Mr. Lionel Ladbrooke. They played a Mozart Serenade, movements from Tchaikovsky's Op. 11, Brahms's Op. 51, No. 2, and Beethoven's Op. 130.——In the Coliseum, on November 19, the Philharmonic Society gave a performance of 'Samson,' under the direction of Prof. G. Leake.——In Avenue Hall, on November 25, the Ladies' Choir sang Rathbone's 'The Singing Leaves,' some 'Negro Spirituals,' and part-songs by Elgar, Lee Williams, and Sullivan.——On December 2, under the direction of Mr. Lionel Ladbrooke (who played the 'cello), Schumann's Pianoforte Quartet in A, Kalinnikov's 'The Beatitudes,' and Quartets by Glazounov and Dvorák, were played. Miss Eda Kersey was the pianist, Mr. A. E. Trigg the violinist, and Mr. W. Jaggard the viola player. ——At University College, on December 3, Prof. George Leake lectured on 'A Neglected Composer—Sterndale Bennett.' Women students sang 'Gentle Zephyr' and 'Maydew,' which, with vocal duets, trios, and solos from various works, made an agreeable programme.

TEIGNMOUTH.—On December 4 the Choral Society (which now numbers thirty-five, with only one tenor!) performed 'Phaudrig Crohoore,' and Vaughan Williams's Choral Fantasia, 'Christmas Day.' The band played also some dances from Purcell's 'The Faery Queen' and Elgar's Serenade. Mr. J. Smith conducted, and Mr. Frank Webster sang some Purcell songs.

TORQUAY. — Beethoven's first Symphony, Widor's first Concert Suite, and a Mozart Minuet and Trio arranged for strings and wood-wind were played by the Winter Orchestra on December 10, and a Suite, 'Three Famous Pictures,' by Haydn Wood, on December 12. Mr. Ernest W. Goss conducted.

TORRINGTON.—Mr. J. F. Webber conducted the Choral Society and Orchestra on December 3 in a programme that included Bach's 'Peasant' Cantata, Stanford's 'Corydon, arise,' Dunhill's 'Early one morning,' and Purcell's 'Nymphs and Shepherds.'

WELLS.—The Cathedral Choir, the Musical Association, and the Choral Societies of Street, Shepton Mallet, and Wedmore—two hundred voices and an orchestra—performed 'Elijah' on December 10, conducted by the Rev. A. H. Peppin.

WEYMOUTH.—Part 1 of the Weymouth Choral Society's programme on December 10 consisted of works by Parry—'Jerusalem,' 'Blest Pair of Sirens' and two songs. Part 2 was the 'Hymn of Praise.' Mr. Reginald J. Swindells conducted.

WOKING.—The Musical Society gave a choral and orchestral concert at the Palace Theatre on December 9, under the direction of Mr. Patrick H. White. Excellent performances were given of Coleridge-Taylor's 'Kubla Khan,' Brahms's 'Alto Rhapsody' (with Madame Kirkby Lunn), the 'Hebrides' Overture, and a movement from Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony.

YORK.—Madrigals and part-songs were sung by a choir of thirty voices at the York Madrigal Society's first concert of the season on November 26. The modern pieces included Dyson's 'Evening' and Balfour Gardiner's 'Cargoes.'——The Catterall Quartet opened a programme with Novácek's Quartet in E flat on December 6.——Byrd's 'Great' Service was given in the Minster on December 14.

Music in Scotland

The Scottish Orchestral season opened on November 15, with Felix Weingartner as guest-conductor. Starting rather quietly with the 'Oberon' Overture—with which Kussewitzky introduced himself so sensationally last season—Weingartner speedily played himself into public favour, and on the termination of his engagement, on December 13, was given a farewell demonstration of quite unusual warmth. His most conspicuous successes were in Beethoven, conducted throughout without score, but Brahms, Schumann, Schubert, Mozart, Mendelssohn, and Berlioz, all seemed congenial to his temperament, and benefited accordingly.

In the Ninth Symphony, the Glasgow Choral Union, admirably trained by Mr. Wilfrid Senior, and inspired by Weingartner's baton, gave perhaps the best performance we have had from these singers in recent years in any work. Least satisfactory of all Weingartner's efforts was his presentation of the Elgar 'Enigma' Variations. Here the smooth, flexible working of section into section, and all the intimate, loving little touches of detail which make the piece a living whole in the hands of a Landon Ronald or an Elgar, were conspicuous by their absence.

The first performance of Weingartner's new fifth Symphony, in C minor, was an interesting event, but the Symphony is not likely to be much heard of in future. Classical in its construction, masterly in its orchestration, tuneful to a degree, the thematic material is copious, but for the most part reminiscent and commonplace. Where well-knit development is called for, we mostly get instead varied repetition of the themes—except in the fugal last movement, the brilliant and logical working out of which, however, fails to make its legitimate effect owing to the thickness and closeness of the orchestral texture. The engaging Scherzo (divorced from the very ordinary Trio which follows) might do well in separate form. Of the other novelties, the most important, Respighi's 'The Fountains of Rome,' seemed on a second hearing to have less to say than at the first.

Of the soloists, the young Scoto-Australian violinist, Miss Alma Moodie, made a sensational first appearance in this country, her performance of the Beethoven Concerto placing her at once in the front rank of living violinists. Walter Gieseking, a pianist new to Scotland, gave the unfortunate pianoforte—in the first movement of Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Concerto—as bad a time as we can remember, following this up later by playing a group of solos with consummate taste and delicacy of shading.

The Scottish Orchestra itself, led by Mr. Horace Fellowes—now the proud possessor of a superb Joseph Guarnerius, lately acquired—is probably better in most of its departments this season than at any time within the past ten years, but the brass is none too secure at times, and the horns in particular give us many nervous moments.

The Scottish Orchestra visited Aberdeen to collaborate with Mr. Willan Swainson's Oratorio Choir in Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' Holst's 'Hymn of Jesus,' and selections from 'Parsifal' and the B minor Mass. In all except the Bach, the choral and orchestral work under Mr. Swainson was of excellent quality, and worthy of a much bigger audience.

The visit of the British National Opera Co. to Edinburgh and Glasgow drew thinner houses than on the last visit, due in part, no doubt, to the fever of election time. The general standard was well maintained. Of the new productions, Vaughan Williams's 'Hugh the Drover' had a brilliant send-off, and was enthusiastically received at every performance, the first Act meeting with special favour. The conducting of Dr. Malcolm Sargent, a new-comer, in this and other operas, made a considerable impression, despite its youthful exuberance. He struck us as being perhaps the most promising of all the younger school of British conductors.

At Glasgow, during the B.N.O.C.'s visit, a largely attended public meeting was held at which it was resolved to appoint a representative committee for the purpose of forming an Opera Goers' Society, and raising a local Guarantee Fund to finance future visits of the Company. How far this is likely to relieve the difficulties of the B.N.O.C. seems to rest not so much on the knees of the gods as in the hands of the patrons of circle and stall. But one thing is due to be said. Such local 'representative committees' as the B.N.O.C. has hitherto been instrumental in having appointed have been remarkable chiefly and notoriously for their 'unrepresentative' character.

Prof. Donald F. Tovey's activities at Edinburgh this winter include the conducting of the Edinburgh Reid Orchestra, the directing of a series of Sunday evening concerts, and the carrying on of the old-established series of Reid Historical Concerts at the University. The programmes of the Historical Concerts, sustained by the Professor and the Edinburgh String Quartet, are predominantly classical, and this applies to the Sunday evening concerts, at which Prof. Tovey, assisted by members of the Edinburgh String Quartet and wind players from the Reid Orchestra, has been playing to well-filled halls. The Reid Orchestra, unfortunately, despite (perhaps because of) its musicianly programmes, does not seem to make much progress in public favour, the audiences in Usher Hall being lamentably poor. At one of these concerts recently, Prof. Tovey's own Pianoforte Concerto in A major was played (by the composer himself) for the first time, and was heartily received. At another, Sibelius's Violin Concerto was introduced by an excellent violinist, new to Scotland, Mr. E. Whitfield.

Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Dundee have had visits from Galli-Curci, Frieda Hempel, Casals, and Kreisler. Of these, the greatest artist and executant, Casals, had the least crowded halls. Kreisler, the erstwhile noble player of noble concerted works, appears content now to play the smaller things of music. Once a great violinist, now a great fiddler! One wonders why.

At Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Dundee, the Glasgow Orpheus Choir (Mr. Hugh S. Roberton) gave eight concerts between December 3 and 13, singing to audiences aggregating twenty thousand people. New works sung by the choir included Rutland Boughton's 'Sea Rune,' Francis George Scott's 'O Jesu Parvule,' Gerrard Williams's 'Bonnie Peg,' and Robert McLeod's 'The Snow.'

Mr. Hugh S. Roberton travelled to Aberdeen to conduct a Sunday evening's Community Singing of old traditional Scots Psalm-Tunes for the British Broadcasting Co., but had less than his usual success, as he found himself in the position of Samson shorn of his locks, being practically speechless with a heavy cold.

The new Chamber Orchestra of the Glasgow Bach Society, numbering about thirty excellent players, made its début at the Society's first chamber concert, and had a considerable success in the B minor Suite for flute and strings, the D major Suite for orchestra, and the D minor Pianoforte Concerto. The Bach Choir sang one or two choruses acceptably. Mr. J. Michael Diack and Mr. F. H. Bisset shared the conducting. The Glasgow Bach Society is broadcasting a vocal and instrumental Bach concert (mostly choral), from the Broadcasting Co.'s studio on the first Sunday evening of each month.

The programme of a concert given by the Glasgow Police Association Choir (Mr. Thorpe Davie, conductor) included Bach's 'Peasant' Cantata, Coleridge-Taylor's 'Death of Minnehaha,' and some part-songs.

The Edinburgh Amateur Orchestral Society (Mr. Paul Della Torre, conductor) and the Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society (Mr. Peebles Conn, conductor) gave interesting and well-attended concerts.

The congregation of Glasgow Cathedral has presented the Cathedral organist, Mr. Herbert Walton, with a cheque for £220 in appreciation of his twenty-seven years' tenure of the post.

The series of orchestral lecture-concerts for school-children, run conjointly by the Edinburgh Education Authority and Messrs. Paterson, and brilliantly directed by Mr. Herbert Wiseman, continue their successful course, the large Usher Hall being filled at every concert with interested youngsters, admitted at the nominal price of sixpence. At Glasgow, a less extended series of concerts of a similar kind is being run by the Education Authority with the Scottish Orchestra.

Banff Orchestral and Choral Society (Mr. Harold George, conductor) showed genuine enterprise and energy firstly in taking up the study of Rutland Boughton's choral drama, 'Bethlehem,' and secondly in bringing up the composer to conduct the performance. The Society's enterprise was rewarded with a large measure of success. In the nature of things, the orchestral part left a good deal unexpressed, but the choral and solo work was bravely and effectively carried through, and the performance was much enjoyed. B.

Music in Wales

ABERYSTWYTH.—B. J. Dale's 'Phantasy' for viola and pianoforte, and 'Welsh Miniatures,' by E. T. Davies, for pianoforte trio, were among the chamber works given at the College concert on November 20. A small choir sang arrangements of Welsh airs.——At the concert on November 27 the choir sang Walford Davies's 'Nursery Rhymes,' and a sextet gave C. H. Lloyd's 'The Forest Fairy.'

BANGOR.—The annual concert of University College took place on November 19, under the direction of Mr. E. T. Davies. The University Choir of two hundred members performed the 'St. Matthew' Passion, with full orchestra, the latter comprising members of the Hallé, Philharmonic, and local orchestras. The principals were Miss Elsie Suddaby, Mr. Tudor Davies, Mr. Owen Bryngwyn, and Mr. Powell Edwards.

CARDIFF.—Mr. Frank Mullings was the singer at the Capitol concert on November 23, Mr. Falkman's Octet played Finck's 'Chopiniana,' and Mr. Plotenj Worth played Hungarian music for violin.——The Musical Society, under Mr. T. E. Aylward (who has been the conductor for thirty-eight years), sang unaccompanied part-songs of the 16th century on November 26, including Morley's 'It was a lover,' Stanford's 'Heraclitus,' some Parry pieces, and Bantock's 'Cuchulain.'

HARLECH.—A Chamber Music Society, recently formed, met for the first time on November 26. The performers were Mr. Josef Holbrooke, Dr. Heath, Mrs. Heath, and Mr. Arthur Williams, and the programme included violin, viola, and pianoforte Trios by Nola Nereff and Naumann, and pianoforte solos by Debussy and Rachmaninov.

PENARTH.—On December 9 the Choral Society, conducted by Mr. A. W. Downing, and supported by an orchestra, performed Herbert Brewer's 'Sir Patrick Spens' and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Bon-bon' Suite.' Mr. Percy Underwood was the solo singer, and Mr. Percival Hodgson played violin music.

SWANSEA.—The Swansea Chamber Concerts opened with a lecture by Mr. Percy Scholes, and the succeeding programmes were undertaken by the Elzy Pianoforte Quartet, the Meredyll Pianoforte Quartet, Joan Willis (violoncello) and others, and on December 11, the Spencer Dyke String Quartet.——University College Musical Society opened its season with a Brahms evening, the players being the Aberystwyth Trio.

Music in Ireland

The Shanahan testimonial concert at La Scala, on November 23, was a success, testifying to the popularity of the late Leonard Shanahan, whose tragic death was keenly felt in Dublin musical circles.

Kreisler was the attraction at the 'celebrity concert' at the Theatre Royal, Dublin, on November 23, and the house was packed, even the stage and orchestra being occupied by enthusiastic listeners. On November 24, Cortôt repeated his old triumphs, showing no signs of impaired virtuosity, especially in the four Chopin Ballades.

Mr. Joseph O'Mara's concert, at the Theatre Royal, Dublin, on November 30, was an artistic success. On December 1, the chamber music recitals of the Royal Dublin Society provided enjoyable pianoforte and 'cello items by Messrs. Esposito and Twelvetrees.

Madame Galli-Curci, after a booming by publicity methods of questionable character, had a great reception at Belfast on December 4, and at Dublin on December 6. She was assisted by her husband, Mr. Homer Samuels (accompanist) and M. Menuel Berenguer, who, as the papers say, 'performed on a flute of solid gold.'

Dublin University Choral Society, now in its eighty-eighth year, gave a pleasing performance of Mozart's Mass in C minor (its second performance in Ireland) on December 4, under the direction of Dr. Hewson. The orchestra, led by Mr. Arthur Darley, did excellent work, and the choral department was sound—albeit unsteady at times.

Quite a delightful treat was the chamber music recital by the Royal Dublin Society in the Theatre Royal, Dublin, on December 8, when the Brodsky Quartet and Prof. Esposito gave of their best. On December 15, under the same auspices, Solomon the pianist was the attraction.

Mr. Frederick Dawson gave an interesting lecture at the Theatre Royal, on December 5, on pianoforte music, dwelling particularly on the greatness of Chopin, who, he said, had influenced Debussy, Wagner, and Scriabin. His illustrations were convincing.

Dr. B. Warburton Rooke has been elected on the Board of Governors of the Royal Irish Academy of Music, for the year 1925.

Mr. Victor Love gave an interesting pianoforte recital at Dublin, on December 10. The selections were mostly of the modern romantic school. Backhaus was the attraction at the Theatre Royal on December 13.

The death of Mr. P. J. O'Reilly, lyric writer, whose songs 'Drake goes West,' 'Down here,' 'Lads o' Devon,' &c., were very popular, is mourned by a large circle of friends in co. Wexford.

'DRINK TO ME ONLY WITH THINE EYES': WHO COMPOSED THE MODERN SETTING?

There is no need to dwell on the beautiful melody associated with the song 'Drink to me only with thine eyes': it has been part and parcel of British song for fully a hundred and fifty years. Yet no serious effort seems to have been made to unearth the composer, and hence the air is universally ascribed to that useful individual known as 'Anon.'

Of course there is no difficulty whatever regarding the words of the song. It is common knowledge that they are by Ben Jonson, and are to be found in his poem entitled 'The Forest,' headed 'To Celia,' published in 1616. Its beauty as a lyric must have appealed to more than one composer during the 17th century, but the earliest setting that has survived is that by James Oswald, printed c. 1753-54, entitled 'The Thirsty Lover.' Mr. F. Kidson has a MS. setting in a folio book dated 1782, and he tells us that Thomas Linley composed a new air which was published in his posthumous works but apparently dating from the period 1765-75.

The ascription of the air to a certain Colonel Mellish may be dismissed, as that gentleman was not born till 1777, at which date the air had been published. No doubt the fact of Colonel Mellish's having made this air popular by his singing it at the concerts of the Noblemen's and Gentlemen's Catch Club, in 1798, may have given rise to the legend that he actually composed it. Equally silly is the ascription of the air to Mozart!

The present air was first published by S. Babb, of 132, Oxford Street, London, as a Glee for three voices, c. 1774-75, but soon after, in 1778, was issued as a vocal solo by John Lee, of Dublin. It was also popular as a vocal duet between the years 1779 and 1784, and in Fanny Burney's Diary, under date June, 1782, she tells us that the two daughters of the Dean of Winchester sang 'Drink to me only with thine eyes.' Her opinion of it is as follows:

> 'They then condescended to begin, and a very pretty little old song it was, and sung vastly well, and with a good deal of taste. The youngest has the sweetest voice, but they stopped in the middle of the song.'

It must have been very popular, as I find an American edition published by Reinagle, of Philadelphia, in 1789.

It is remarkable that neither Babb's edition, nor Lee's, nor Reinagle's, nor any of the printed copies from 1775 to 1800, give any name of a composer. Dr. Burney made a search, but failed to locate the writer of this charming melody. Even Chappell writes:

> 'All attempts to discover the author of this exquisite air have hitherto proved unavailing, and in all probability will now remain so.'

Without further preamble, let me say that the actual composer of 'Drink to me only' was Dr. Henry Harrington, of Bath. Born at Kelston in 1727, he took his M.A. and M.D. degrees at Oxford in 1751. He settled down as a physician at Bath, but did not neglect music, publishing numerous volumes of glees, catches, rounds, and songs, as well as a sacred dirge, 'Eloi, Eloi.' He was composer to the Harmonic Society of Bath from 1784 till his death on January 15, 1816.

From whatever cause, now unaccountable, Dr. Harrington did not for years acknowledge the setting of Ben Jonson's song; but I find his name printed as the composer in a sheet song issued by Goulding & Co., London, in 1803-04. The name 'Harrington' also appears as the composer in a rare volume (now before me): 'A Select Collection of Songs,' published by Hodgson, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, in 1806. Again, in the 'British Orpheus,' published at Stourport, in 1812, I find the initials 'H. H.' pencilled as composer. Therefore we can justly claim for Dr. Harrington the composition of 'Drink to me only with thine eyes.'

IGOR STRAVINSKY AT BERLIN

From Leipsic, where he had played his Pianoforte Concerto in the Gewandhaus, Stravinsky came to Berlin, where he had to perform it once more under the baton of Furtwängler. His visit had excited the expectations of all those interested in new music. Stravinsky grew famous during the war, and therefore Germany has known little of him. In the last few years, however, and especially after the first performance of his 'Le Sacre du Printemps' by the German section of the International Society for Contemporary Music, he has exerted a strong influence over German composers, among them Paul Hindemith and Ernst Krenek. This, however, has not yet spread to the musical public, which so far remains unconvinced of his superiority, whereas the young artists are deeply impressed by his art. On the whole, the reproach of atonality, so often launched against Stravinsky, has made him suspect to music-lovers, however much they are excited by the peculiar rhythm and colour of his music.

The reception which Stravinsky found at the Berlin Philharmonic proved that in any case he was considered one of the leading spirits of our musical age. On two consecutive days we had good opportunities for observing the public behaviour. At the rehearsal, which is equal to a performance, he was welcomed very heartily by the younger generation of musicians, who spread themselves to enjoy the composer's presence and his playing. Though there was some opposition, he was applauded with extraordinary emphasis. The Pianoforte Concerto, nevertheless, was misunderstood. It had been regarded as a sequel to works like 'Le Sacre du Printemps,' which certainly it is not, and its relative simplicity left some musicians rather cold. Others found the combination of Bach and Stravinsky not wholly convincing. As a player Stravinsky showed perfect mastery of the keyboard. There was a great difference between the first performance of the solo part of this work, which I had heard at Paris, and the present occasion. Stravinsky's playing, or rather hammering, the notes out of the keyboard had made his Concerto appear more aggressive and harsh than it really is. Furtwängler was in complete accord with the composer, who requires from the conductor the most exact observance of all the metronomic marks. From this point of view the performance was perfect.

It cannot be denied that the Concerto is in some respects the solution of the problem with which most composers of the younger generation are absorbed. We live, however, in a country where the influence of Schönberg overshadows that of any other composer. Schönberg has undoubtedly enriched musical theory. Never contenting himself with the surface of things, he probes to the very heart of music. He seems, however, to be prostrated by his own theory, whereas Stravinsky, who is, apparently, much more superficial in theory, wields a creative force enabling him to solve all the problems of his inspiration. Now we are on the way to a realisation of the potentialities of this modern art, we feel its effects in the great and never-ceasing activities of our young composers.

'DIE NÄCHTLICHEN,' BY EGON WELLESZ

How far-reaching is the influence of Stravinsky was proved by a new ballet performed at the Berlin Staatsoper. 'Die Nächtlichen' is based on a poem by Max Terpis, the new ballet-master, and the music is by Egon Wellesz. The work contains nine scenes, in which the mystery of night is symbolised. It must be added that this ballet had its inspiration in the new school of dancing, whose leading spirit is Rudolf von Laban. Quite contrary to the Russian Ballet, the new dance has an intellectual rather than a sensual appeal. This may sound novel, but there are some pupils of von Laban's—as, for instance, Mary Wigman—who have attained a high degree of perfection in this art, though of course the more sensual pleasure connected with the Russian Ballet will never be surpassed by the impression of the new dancing, the character of which is rather austere.

Egon Wellesz's ballet, however, shows very distinct traces of Stravinsky's influence. 'Le Sacre du Printemps' has created a number of imitations, just at the time when the composer himself, turning away from ballet, has become identified with the pursuit of pure music. Stravinsky has left theatre and ballet behind him, and now finds delight in formal problems. Wellesz had been so deeply obsessed with the primitiveness of Stravinsky that he evidently had some difficulty in discovering a style of his own. Yet it was a very interesting evening, because it exemplified a novel essay in an art which, curiously, seems generally to be despised by musicians. The dancing was very far from being perfect. It is not easy to accustom dancers educated in the old ballet school to be æscetic in their movements, and to renounce all that gives to their art its sensual charm. On this occasion, 'Arleschino,' by Ferruccio Busoni, the most pleasing descendant of the commedia dell' arte, was revived with great success, owing chiefly to the unusual abilities of the conductor, Erich Kleiber.

NEW YORK

The most prominent event of the season that New York musicians have looked forward to, has been the début of Serge Kussewitzky. It is true that America loves novelties—not only in the way of compositions, but in interpreters as well. Nevertheless, we retain our judicial faculties, no matter how great our anticipations may be. Kussewitzky came to us with an enormous European reputation, and Boston had endorsed it. He chose for his New York début Vivaldi, Weber, Debussy, Honegger, and Scriabin, and it may be said emphatically that the Vivaldi was a beautiful, classical piece of work, showing no trace of the conductor's strong sympathies with modern composers. In the 'Oberon' Overture he was not so fortunate. There he showed his sensational tendencies too violently. His Debussy was very beautifully done—the 'Nuages' especially, with more subtlety than we are accustomed to, but that very quality giving it more charm. The 'Pacific 231' has already become familiar to us, but Kussewitzky gave us the best performance we have yet had of Honegger's stirring conception of such an unusual subject. As for the Scriabin, one listener could dispense with the 'Poem of Ecstasy' in programmes for the rest of his life, but it seemed rather evident that the Russian conductor was most in sympathy with modern ideas and those who express them.

Alexander Brailovsky made his American début in Liszt's B minor Sonata. It was a strange thing to do, and it cannot be said that he was altogether successful in it. His Chopin was the poorest thing he did, and his Stravinsky possibly the best. He has been advertised as 'being the only successor to Rubinstein.' One who heard every recital Rubinstein gave at New York, confidently asserts that he has only one successor, and that is his pupil Josef Hofmann. No one else plays in Rubinstein style; no one else is so satisfying in his playing of all music from Bach to the moderns. Hofmann's first recital for this year has been the most absolutely satisfactory concert of the season so far. Mr. Albert Spalding has as yet no rival this season in his superb work on the violin. Bach's Concerto in D minor, for two violins and orchestra, had a very remarkable performance at a recent concert by the New York Symphony Society, with Spalding and Paul Kochanski playing the two solo instruments. Mr. Spalding is also well known as a composer for solo violin, but this year he has had a Quartet played by the Flonzaleys. It has moments of great beauty, but it is rather fragile and formless, reminiscent of the work of foreign hands and heart that Mr. Spalding loves.

New York has no great choral society—nothing, in fact, to compare with the Toronto Choir. But the Oratorio Society is ambitious, and gave us quite recently Holst's 'Hymn to Jesus,' that mystical half-pagan, half-Christian composition for two choruses and orchestra with apocryphal text. The whole work is very impressive, and the antiphonal writing very beautiful. It is a composition to be heard more than once, it is a composition to be studied, and English choral music—long dormant and only lately revived—seems to have found its best living exponent in Holst. The amount of research work expended on the text alone is colossal, and proves Holst to be a veritable student in more arts than one.

The Friends of Music devoted their first concert entirely to Bach—the C major Toccata and Fugue for organ; the 'Bauern' Cantata; the third 'Brandenberg' Concerto, and the Cantata 'Actus Tragicus.' No other organization would dare in these days to begin a concert with a Toccata for the organ, but the Friends of Music are a law unto themselves. It proved a happy innovation, and Mr. Lynnwood Farnam was an excellent interpreter of the composition. The 'Bauern' Cantata had Miss Rethberg and Mr. Schutzendorf for the soprano and bass solos, and they were true peasants in their humorous delivery of the music, while additional good work was done by the chorus from the Metropolitan Opera House. The climax of the concert was the performance of the funeral music 'Actus Tragicus.' The soloists were Miss Marian Telva, Mr. George Meader, and Mr. Gustave Schutzendorf, again with the assistance of the Metropolitan chorus.

New York is deluged with concerts, and it would take a volume to record the recitals of all kinds. Vocalists, pianists, and violinists come by the score, and it is marvellous how audiences can be recruited to hear so many; so many, too, that are really good, and deserving of more attention and praise than there is time and space to bestow upon them.

TORONTO

We are indebted to the Women's Musical Club for a pianoforte recital of most unusual merit. Miss Gitta Gradova, the Russian girl of nineteen whose name is at present so conspicuous at New York, created a deep impression, especially in her playing of Bach and Scriabin. The promise of her present attainments in style, technique, and musicianly conception should enable this young player to contemplate a brilliant future.

Two more worthy programmes have drawn large audiences to the New Symphony Orchestra Twilight Concerts. Mr. von Kunits is wisely selecting his works from as wide a field as possible, e.g., Cherubini's 'Anacreon' Overture; the Largo from the 'New World' Symphony; the 'Procession to the Cathedral,' from 'Lohengrin'; and Beethoven's A major Symphony. At the first concert Miss Vera Barstow played the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto; at the second Mr. Arthur Blight sang the popular 'Largo al factotum,' from Rossini's 'Barber of Seville.'

We are now looking to the Hart House String Quartet for some of our best chamber music. At their second concert these ambitious musicians definitely realised that unity of mental conception without which a quartet is merely a co-operation of four solo instruments. Intensely satisfying were the Quartets of Mozart in B flat major (Op. 9), of Beethoven in B flat major (Op. 18, No. 6), and that of Elgar. The last-named work was most favourably received, largely on account of its novel and unfamiliar individuality of theme and rhythm.

The New York String Quartet, again under the auspices of the Women's Musical Club, confirmed our previous opinion that the members are determined to become popular, whatever else they may do. They played magnificently and crudely in alternation throughout a fascinating mixture of Smetana (the E minor Quartet), Mozart (an E flat Quartet), Borodin (Notturno and Scherzo), Goossens ('By the Tarn'), and Grainger ('Molly on the Shore').

Mr. Edward Johnson, our leading Canadian tenor in the States, gave a well-balanced programme of the usual quality, in conjunction with the brilliant South American pianist, Miss Guiomar Novaes.

In home talent we have enjoyed recitals by Mesdames Nina Gale and Lugrin Fahey (vocalists), and Messrs. Viggo Kihl and Max Meller (pianoforte).

Mr. Withrow has given us Madame Pavlova and her splendid ballet in three performances, exquisite in their refined artistry. We are looking forward to comparing her remarkable talent with that of Madame Karsavina, who will appear here shortly for the first time. H. C. F.

VIENNA

NEW CONDUCTORS

Of the host of new conductors who have visited Vienna lately, Pietro Mascagni deserves first mention by virtue of his international reputation, if not for any outstanding merit. In fact, the concert which the Maestro directed, and which was largely devoted to his own compositions, was a disappointment not only for the quality of the music but for Mascagni's own untemperamental conducting. It is interesting to note that he has accepted a permanent engagement for a number of months at the Staatsoper, where he proposes to conduct Italian opera, and in particular his own 'Amico Fritz,' at the same time supervising the preparations for the German première of his operetta, 'Si' ('Yes') at the Bürgertheater. The Staatsoper found little occasion for rejoicing at the début of this star conductor, which occurred at one of those painful polyglot performances of 'La Traviata,' with Mattia Battistini as star singer, delivering his familiar aria in perfect concert style. Disappointment at Mascagni's evident equanimity and lack of initiative was general. Only a small audience greeted him on his second appearance, in 'Aïda.'

Another concert of a more or less freakish nature was that directed by Siegfried Wagner. He offered one of his customary family programmes, in which the composer-conductor's own weak products are adorned with selections from Richard Wagner and from his own famous grandfather, Franz Liszt.

A new-comer of more than ordinary interest was Peter van Anrooy, a Dutch conductor, who gave a remarkable reading of Brahms's first Symphony. The ghostly and weird effects which the late Arthur Nikisch was wont to achieve with his quasi-improvised rubato in the pizziccati of the last movement, are still fresh in memory; yet Anrooy held his own with an interpretation which was strongly personal and well conceived. In his other capacity—as composer of a harmless and none too noteworthy orchestral rhapsody entitled 'Piet Hein'—he was less successful. At the same concert, Tibor Szatmari, the eminent Hungarian pianist, displayed remarkable technique and plasticity in his brilliant performance of Liszt's A major Concerto.

The safest way for a new conductor to secure the attention of the public, or, at least, of the musico-professional, is to include really notable novelties in his début programme. Dr. Richard Ehrmann, a Viennese conductor, made a wise choice in presenting Schönberg's 'Pelleas and Melisanda,' the early composition which has been rarely heard here since its rather tempestuously received première. Ehrmann acquitted himself creditably, although the wonderfully flawless reading which Schönberg himself gave here some years ago (it was achieved after ten semi-public orchestral rehearsals!) will probably remain unsurpassed for some time to come.

At the subscripton concerts of the Konzertverein, Dirk Foch, the Dutch conductor, has established himself as successor to Ferdinand Löwe, the aged and revered Vienna musician. Foch's reading of Beethoven's Ninth was noteworthy for its brisk tempi, particularly in the second movement (which rivalled the pace of the great Toscanini), and the Finale, where choir and orchestra managed with surprising efficiency to cope with the conductor's demands in the way of speed. The only novelty which Mijnheer Foch has so far produced was obviously chosen for the benefit of his notoriously conservative subscribers. It was none other than César Franck's symphonic poem, 'Le chasseur maudit,' that piece of mild programme music which appears all the less important when we consider that the date of its origin (1883) almost coincided with the writing of certain famous works of Richard Strauss.

ORCHESTRAL NOVELTIES

Felix Weingartner, whose extensive foreign commitments have led to his sharing this season's Philharmonic concerts with Franz Schalk, departed from the routine of the subscription series by producing no less than three novelties in the first two programmes. These comprised Vittorio Rieti's Concerto for wind instruments—the witty burlesque on operatic banality and diatonic simplicity which was first performed at last summer's Prague music festival; a brilliant symphonic poem, 'Andalusia,' by Lamote de Grignon, the Barcelona composer-conductor who draws his subject-matter from Spanish dance rhythms; and a 'Romantic Phantasy' by Friedrich Engelbrech (a deserving member of the Philharmonic Orchestra), which revels in passionate and exalted string melodies that spring from the invention of Wagner and Richard Strauss. The third concert of the Philharmonic brought the début of Franz Schalk as permanent co-conductor of this organization. His entrée was made with two modern French works, i.e., 'Nocturne de Printemps' and 'Le Joli Jeu de Furet,' both somewhat light, but extremely tasteful and well-scored pieces by Roger Ducasse, which combine French impressionistic colour with elements of programme music.

A memorable event was a concert given by the Typographia Choral Society, an organization consisting entirely of printing-house artizans, which celebrated the twentieth anniversary of its foundation with a highly dignified performance of Beethoven's ninth Symphony, under the direction of Paul von Klenau. At the same concert, Franz Salmhofer, the talented young composer and descendant of Franz Schubert, was heard in his latest work, a melodrama with orchestra after Walt Whitman's poem, 'The Mystic Trumpeter.' Salmhofer's talent is beyond doubt, but his all too prolific creative powers and lack of self-criticism seem to jeopardise the robust development of his gifts; moreover, the obsolete form of the work, that of recitation with music, was injudiciously employed in this instance, for the poem was all but drowned by a wealth of pompous orchestral sound.

The orchestral concerts devoted entirely to contemporary Austrian music brought a new Suite for orchestra by Josef Matthias Hauer, who, independently from Schönberg, has arrived at the latter's twelve-tone scale, and has made it the subject of long and erudite (if often fantastic) printed comments. Hauer's music, despite undeniable feeling and logic of construction, reveals nevertheless a strange simplicity, not to say monotony. This is the outcome of his thematic structure. Each theme or melody is dissolved in various smaller groups which he terms 'Tropen,' by the alternate reiteration of which he achieves a certain symmetry of construction. At the same concerts we heard three well-scored songs by Alma Mahler, widow of the composer, and a number of orchestral songs by Franz Schreker that revealed the fine sense of colour customary with this composer. Erich Korngold's latest work, a Pianoforte Concerto written for and excellently played by Paul Wittgenstein, the one-armed pianist, was a disappointment after his recent and excellent String Quartet. This Concerto marks Korngold's return to those methods of superficial brilliancy and effectiveness which won for him a certain popularity with musical amateurs, though not with the discriminating hearer. The work is in one movement consisting of three distinct sections, but only the middle portion—a witty fox-trot—is at all original. For the rest, it is showy, somewhat noisy, and 'operatic' throughout. The qualities of Hugo Kauder's first Symphony in A seemed all the more appealing in comparison. Here is music of the soul, informed with a deep sincerity and fervour. In style, Kauder comes near to Mahler and Bruckner, yet his is decidedly individual music, and moreover reveals splendid workmanship in the great Passacaglia of the last movement.

MODERN CHAMBER MUSIC

Two concerts — devoted principally to ultra-modern chamber music of Viennese origin — attracted large audiences and great general attention. Only in two beautifully-lyrical songs by Karl Horwitz and in an all too eclectic and Brahmsian Sonata by Karl Weigl, were concessions made to the more conservative proclivities of the general public. The remainder of the programmes were recruited from the pioneers of the modern musical movement in Austria. Anton von Webern himself directed his newest work, 'Five Sacred Songs,' with accompaniment of violin, flute, clarinet, trumpet, and harp. They are again in the form of small and short mood-miniatures which glide by before the hearer has accustomed his inner ear to their mosaic of artfully-developed and transformed little motives. The wealth of atmosphere and ethereal beauty of these songs is clear even to him who may be confused by Webern's æscetic language. Egon Wellesz's 'Sacred Song,' on the other hand, is an earlier work which betrays certain French influences. It is music of a cultured and erudite mind, and is much more direct in its appeal than many of the composer's later compositions. Surprising in its spontaneity was the String Quartet by Paul A. Pisk, which served to dispel the general notion that this young artist is a sort of pale and esoteric dreamer. The Quartet is a virile and impetuous work. This quality of directness and spontaniety is the chief trait of Hans Eisler, the young Schönbergian pupil who has recently attracted so much attention. His Sonata for pianoforte is replete with pregnant and fascinating rhythm, and his Duo for violin and 'cello reveals, in addition, a capacity for beautiful 'singing' music. The first movement abounds in fine sustained melodies alternately announced, in close imitation, by the two instruments. The second movement is sweeping in its rhythmic swing; but it is of the crisp sort which shuns cheap effects and mere virtuosic display. Eisler's personality is not unlike that of Paul Hindemith, most 'musikantisch' of the young German composers. But Hindemith, the ever-versatile, appears in another guise with his new Sonata for violoncello. Here he is a classic, who invigorates classic forms with modern ideas and modern daring.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

GIACOMO PUCCINI, the popular composer of 'Bohème,' 'Tosca,' 'Butterfly,' and other less fortunate operas, who died at Brussels, on November 29, after an operation for cancer of the throat had been successfully performed. Cardiac weakness supervened, and he passed away quietly and painlessly. He was thus more fortunate in death than Boïto, whose last thoughts were all for his unpublished 'Nerone,' and far more fortunate than Verdi, who lived long enough to see all those who were dear to him disappear, and, after a long, healthy life, felt all the ills of old age fasten slowly upon him one by one. On the whole, Puccini's life was that of a spoilt child of fortune. He had disappointments, of course, but they were never deep nor bitter. Born at Lucca, on June 22, 1858, Giacomo Puccini soon showed signs of talent, and, as he came of a family which had given Italy some distinguished musicians, his ability was noted and carefully cultivated. A scholarship offered by the Queen of Italy enabled him to enter the Milan Conservatoire, where his chief instructor, Ponchielli, stinted neither praise nor encouragement. His first opera, 'Le Villi,' did not win the award in the competition for which it was written; but it attracted the notice of Boïto, thanks to whom it was performed in public, and was so well received that Ricordi, the publisher, bought it, and Puccini changed in a day from an impecunious student into a young composer accepted by the highest authorities of his country. 'Le Villi' was followed by 'Edgar,' which was a complete failure 1889), but four years later 'Manon' retrieved the composer's fortunes with a more complete success than that of 'Le Villi.' The opera, however, which established his reputation was 'Bohème,' first performed at the Teatro Regio of Turin (1896). The favourable verdict of the Turinese was soon confirmed by other Italian audiences, and abroad the success was no less emphatic. To this day, 'Bohème' remains one of the most popular operas of the modern repertory, and it may be said to represent all that is best in Puccini's music—its melodious languor, its sympathy for sorrowing, stricken heroines (the protagonists of all Puccini's operas are women), its infallible sense of the stage, its bustling vitality. 'Tosca' (Rome, 1900) is a far more questionable product. The composer's melodic vein often tends to become stereotyped, and if at moments he rises decidedly above mediocrity, there are also moments when he descends to a lower level than one would have thought possible to the composer of 'Bohème.' Its appeal for the masses is that which Mr. Bernard Shaw has aptly styled 'Sardoudledom'—a series of dramatic shocks, well planned and well carried out, of no artistic importance. Four years later 'Butterfly' made its first appearance at Milan, where it failed completely. A few months afterwards that verdict was reversed at Brescia, and 'Butterfly' thenceforth followed 'Tosca' and 'Bohème' on the way of success. After 'Butterfly' came a time of experiments. Puccini had travelled abroad much more than his masters. He had struck up a friendship with Richard Strauss, and with some French composers. He could not close his eyes to the new movement, for Debussy and Strauss had triumphed everywhere in Italy, and he resolved to assimilate as much as possible of their methods. 'The Girl of the Golden West' (1910) is the hybrid outcome of that resolve. Its fortunes have varied a good deal according to the tradition and temper of various audiences. It is not likely to be long lived. What may be called the 'new' style is more effectively used in 'Trittico,' a series of three plays which, well received in Italy, were performed at Covent Garden (1920). Of these three one-Act plays it is undoubtedly the last—the merry 'Gianni Schicchi'—which most decidedly won the approval of the public. The other two are interesting musically, but inadequate dramatically. The first, 'Il Tabarro,' is lurid melodrama, and the second deals too briefly with a story requiring detailed treatment. Here for the present our knowledge of Puccini ends. Another opera of his, 'Turandot,' based on a story of the Italian 18th-century writer, Carlo Gozzi, was promised to the subscribers of the Scala Theatre for next February. It is improbable that the death of the composer will delay its production. Personally, Puccini was an exceedingly modest, peace-loving man. But he could also be determined to the point of obstinacy, as when he refused to sign the Italian manifesto against German art during the war, because the request had been made to him in the terms of a command. That refusal cost him many royalties from Paris, where his operas were banned for a time. He liked best to live in the retirement of his villa at Torro del Lago, near Viareggio. Even the sea disturbed him—'Too much wind and too much noise,' he said, 'and I need quiet in order to work.' His music has often been attacked with a bitterness that was quite undeserved. Puccini is not to be measured by the standards which we may apply to the giants of music. He wrote for the great audiences of the theatre—not for the more critical and cultured cognoscenti. Those felt with him as he felt for them, for their griefs and for their tragedies chronicled in the columns of the newspaper, not in the annals of history.

F. B.

SERGHEI LIAPOUNOV—November 30, 1859; November 8, 1924. Liapounov's death at Paris passed almost unnoticed outside France—probably for the reason that very little of his output is known. He was the last representative of the Russian 'Nationalist' School which came into existence under the direct influence of Glinka, and from which Glazounov, his junior, seceded long ago in deed if not in principle. He lived many years in close contact with Balakirev, with whom he had, musically, many affinities. His pianoforte music—especially the twelve 'Grandes Etudes d'Execution Transcendante,' one or two of which are occasionally played here—is of great interest, and instinct with fine lyric poesy. Some of his songs are remarkably fine, and his symphonic and chamber music is notable for its earnestness and often for a genuine grandeur. His collections of Russian folk-tunes are extremely valuable, and historians are greatly indebted to him for his publication of the correspondence between Balakirev and Tchaikovsky and between Balakirev and Rimsky-Korsakov, with instructive prefaces and notes.

ROSE HERSEE, on November 26, at the age of seventy-nine. For many years she was known in England as a leading operatic soprano, and the success of her career, according to all accounts, was won by genuine artistic quality. She first appeared in Mapleson's Company at Drury Lane in 1868. The next year, with her father (Henry Hersee, a prominent manager and critic), she opened the 'New Italian Opera' at the Lyceum, a venture which, owing to illnesses and other misfortunes, ran for only one night. Thereupon she took up an engagement in America. In 1871 she was at St. James's Theatre in London, under Mr. Stephen Fiske; in 1872 she again formed a company of her own. And so for many years she made the best of whatever opportunities, especially those offered by the Carl Rosa Opera Company, were open to British singers at the time, and carried a respected career into the present century. Her later years were devoted to teaching.

FREDERICK FRANKLIN CLIVE, on November 30. From 1884, when Madame Patey first introduced him to the public, until 1900, when he retired to become a teacher at the Guildhall School of Music, Franklin Clive held an honoured place among British singers. For many years he worked on the concert platform, at the principal London concerts and on tour. After being engaged to sing as King Richard in Sullivan's 'Ivanhoe' he turned definitely to opera, and became a useful member of the Carl Rosa Company.

PERCIVAL J. ILLSLEY, at Montreal, on October 14, aged fifty-nine. A native of Leek, he was for some time assistant-organist at Lichfield Cathedral, and, after holding other posts, went to Montreal about thirty-five years ago, where he was organist at St. George's Church until his death. He was in 1922-23 president of the Canadian College of Organists.

OSCAR FRANKLIN MISQUITH, at Bangalore, on November 12. He was organist at St. Stephen's, Ootacamund, and, later, at Rangoon Cathedral, until the claims of his office as managing director of Misquiths, Ltd., compelled him to resign.

THE LATE ALFRED GIBSON

As a memorial to the late Alfred Gibson, who died at Mentone on May 21, 1924, it is proposed to found a scholarship for violin and viola playing, to be competed for in rotation by the R.A.M., R.C.M., and the G.S.M. The sum of £1,500 is desired for this purpose. An influential committee has been formed, and the project has received promises of support from a very large circle. Donations should be sent to the hon. treasurer, Lady Cooper, Berrydown Court, Overton, Hants. Other communications should be addressed to the hon. secretary, Mr. Alfred J. Slocombe, 41, Cavendish Road, Brondesbury, N.W.8.

Answers to Correspondents

Questions must be of general musical interest. They must be stated simply and briefly, and if several are sent, each must be written on a separate slip. We cannot undertake to reply by post.

THE MALE ALTO AS SOLOIST

J. C. S.—You express surprise that no musical competition syllabus includes a class for male alto soloists; and you ask us for the reason. First, such a class would attract too few entrants to make it worth while. Male altos of the kind you describe—i.e., voices that have never broken—are (we believe) the rarest of all voices, and we doubt if the average festival area would be able to muster more than a couple. Second, the natural male voice being tenor, baritone, or bass, there is an inevitable feeling of strangeness and discomfort—even distaste—in hearing a man singing with a voice of feminine type. (The same feeling is present during performances by so-called 'female tenors.') We do not deny the charm of a good male alto in male-voice ensemble, especially in quartets, but we do not see any future for soloists, not only because of the universal and instinctive prejudice against them, but even more, perhaps, on account of the difficulty of finding suitable material. If you get away from the stock oratorio airs, such as 'O thou that tellest,' what remains? Practically all the songs for contralto have a text or character that shows them to have been written for women singers; sung by a man, however beautifully, the air of unreality is too great for an audience's enjoyment. At a recent festival we judged a contralto class in which one of the competitors was a young man with an unbroken voice. He sang well, but we could summon up no enthusiasm except as to his qualifications for cathedral choir or male-voice quartet purposes. As the singer in question spoke with the normal man's voice (though light), we wondered why he did not satisfy his ambitions to become a concert soloist by developing as a light tenor. If, as you say, there are many voices of this type, the question is one that calls for discussion by teachers. Perhaps some readers with expert knowledge of the problem will give us the benefit of their experience.

M. C.—You wish to know how to set about conducting a small singing class, having so far had no teaching experience save with individuals. Your first and best step would be to join a good choir, or, alternatively, to obtain permission (on payment of a fee if necessary) to attend a few practices conducted by a skilful teacher. Failing either of these courses, you must do as many hundreds of others have done—take your courage in both hands, and tackle the job, learning as you go along. You will find that this is a branch of work in which musical qualifications are apt to be of less importance than some others. You may be bursting with knowledge, but you will do little good as a class teacher unless you have patience, imagination, ability to express yourself simply and pointedly to a crowd, a knack of being able to use your own voice convincingly for 'patterning,' and the power of rousing and retaining the interest of your class—especially in works that it is inclined to regard as dry and dull. These abilities, plus a sense of humour, make up what is conveniently known as 'personality,' and if you have this, you will not only produce a successful choir, but will also revel in the task. We may add that choirs like a conductor to have a will of his own, so don't be diffident. The constitution of a choral society may, on paper, be as democratic as you please, but in the long run it becomes a benevolent autocracy. Many choralists even enjoy an occasional brief, bright, and brotherly bullying; but they resent sneers and cheap satire. So if you have any vein of sarcasm, give it a rest on practice nights. Finally, don't begin by making your singers painfully conscious of their inefficiency. The sooner you can let them feel that, after all, singing is not so difficult a thing, the better. You will not develop this feeling by stopping them every few bars and worrying them overmuch with subtle details. Intensive study of that kind comes later, when they have begun to feel their feet. So aim first at some approximately good straightforward singing of simple music. When they have tasted the joys of choral singing (they will make horrid noises at times during this stage, but never mind !), you can begin to put on the screw. In choral training, as in most things worth doing, the long game pays. The conductor who, in the early stages, knows when to turn the deaf ear to mistakes and bad tone, generally has a good lot of singers in two or three seasons. Without that tactful deaf ear he might have lost the lot at the end of the first year.

T. S. M.—(1.) There exists no periodical which makes a feature of information in regard to violin literature. But daily papers, and of course newspapers and magazines which make a speciality of musical subjects, all contain some information. (2.) Suitable text-books for hand-gymnastics abound, but before commending their suitability it is necessary to know the student's ability and needs. The whole of Sevcik's 'School' consists of nothing but gymnastics. It would be a disservice, however, to advise Book I to somebody who is ready to tackle Book iv. Albert Sammons has published a book of daily studies which is excellent of its kind. But he presupposes a player of advanced technique. Perhaps the safest is Leonard's 'La Gymnastique du Violoniste,' which begins with exercises suitable for players of moderate skill, going on by degrees to exercises of great difficulty. (3.) No amount of reading can help you to choose a violin. A reputable dealer is the best guide—unless you happen to know personally an expert. Above all things, don't attempt to buy a cheap 'Strad' from a pawnshop. Sherlock Holmes has done it, but no one else is likely to succeed. For a hundred pounds and a little over you can expect an old Italian instrument by a well-known maker. There are excellent English instruments, new and old, to be had for half that sum, and less, thoroughly reliable in every way. Violins of Jean Baptiste Vuillaume command a big price, but there are also instruments by his brother, Nicholas, much cheaper, and reliable.

A DEEP-THINKING STUDENT.—(What a fine label you have tacked on to yourself!) (1.) You do not say whether the year you have spent with your present teacher is your first spell of study of pianoforte playing. If it is not (as seems likely), you certainly ought to be beyond the stage of perpetual 'mistakes and stumbles.' The other questions you ask seem to suggest the advisability of changing your teacher. Ask him about them, and if he has nothing helpful to say, look around for his successor. (2.) Hand and arm exercises away from the keyboard can be used with good results. (3.) We have had no experience of the course you mention, but have heard it well spoken of. We know nothing of the fees or the hours of lessons: you can find out these things yourself. (4.) With one and a-half hours' practice on five days a week you ought to make good progress. Everything depends on the extent to which you live up to your label. As to the allotment of this time, your teacher is the best judge. He knows the points to which you should devote most attention; and the proportions will of course change from time to time. (5.) The appliance is a simple and effective device for stretching the fingers. Write to the inventor for a descriptive pamphlet. (6.) You don't need a book to explain positions of hands in scales, &c. What is your teacher for? Your muscular stiffness is nothing to do with your age. You are a mere chicken yet (twenty-eight). Talk to that teacher of yours!

MELODY.—(1). Prout's text-books are by no means out of date. Inevitably much of his ruling in regard to harmony no longer holds good; his 'Counterpoint' we have always felt was the weakest of the set, and of course it has not improved with the passage of years. But his books on Form, Orchestration, Fugue, and Fugal Analysis contain a vast amount of good stuff, expressed in a manner no less interesting than scholarly. The present-day tendency is to under-rate such theorists as Prout, but (at the risk of appearing old-fashioned) we hold the opinion that he has most of his successors beaten in regard to all-round knowledge and thoroughness. We assume you are working with a teacher; if so, be guided by him as to the choice of text-books. If not, write to us again. (2.) You can obtain Beethoven's Sketch Books, in two volumes, from Novello's.

BASSO.—We are not clear as to what you mean by 'keeping the same depth of tone on middle C, D, and E, as on the bottom G.' Presumably you are thinking of resonance. Seeing that you are able to sing the bass solos from the standard oratorios, you ought to know enough to be able to set about developing resonance on any part of your voice where you feel it to be lacking. It is obviously impossible for us to suggest a remedy without being quite sure of the defect and its cause. You say you are unable to obtain lessons. Nothing can take the place of oral teaching, but you will be able to do a good deal for yourself by careful reading of such books as Behnke's 'Voice, Song, and Speech' (Curwen), and, on the performing side, Plunket Greene's 'Interpretation in Song' (Stainer & Bell).

QUERY.—In Carlton's 'Calm was the air,' at the change of time from 4-4 to 3-2, there is no change of pace. The minim of the 3-4 should equal the crotchet of the preceding movement. Without knowing the exact circumstances in which the adjudicator made the remark you quote, we cannot say how far it applies to your question. We imagine that he meant his audience to understand that, generally speaking, in old madrigals the minim is the unit, even when the notation consists of crotchets. In other words, the time is 2-2 instead of 4-4, and therefore double the pace shown on paper.

DIAPASON.—You seem to have laid a good foundation, but we think the period you suggest for the A.R.C.O. and F.R.C.O. examinations is too short. If you can pass them both in double the period it will be an achievement. (We hope this won't discourage you.) Go ahead and get the A.R.C.O., and then keep your work up on your own account till you can save the fees for another year under a good teacher.

W. P. K.—Your choirmaster tells you to pronounce 'Lord' as 'Lawd,' and you ask if that is the usual pronunciation for singers. Nothing is usual in singers' pronunciation except indistinctness. 'Lord' spells 'Lord,' for singers and speakers alike, so next time you are told to sing 'Lawd,' sing 'LORD' with terrible distinctness.

P. ACTION.—The matter is outside the scope of this column. You may find the information you require in a handbook on 'Repairing the Pianoforte' (Musical Opinion Office, 2*s.* 6*d.*). But you should think twice before tinkering with the instrument, with or without such guidance.

M. B. W.—Here are four pianoforte tutors, all good: 'First Steps at the Pianoforte,' Berger (Novello); 'Art of Pianoforte Playing,' Pauer (Novello); 'First Lessons at the Pianoforte,' Swinstead (Anglo-French Music Co.); 'The Pianist's First Music-Making,' Matthay (Anglo-French Music Co.).

H. C. S.—We imagine any good flute or oboe instruction book would give all that you need in the way of arpeggios. If not, you can easily provide your own, and transpose them in different keys. Try the Oboe Instruction Book, by Brod (Hawkes, 20*s.*).

C. M. J.—The Gloria and Gratias are usually sung to a simple inflection, thus:

'Glory be to Thee, O Lord.'

G. H.—The new edition will probably be ready in about two years' time. For the A.R.C.O. history questions consult special articles in 'Grove'; for a general sketch take Colles's 'Growth of Music' (Oxford University Press).

ORGANUM.—The old Irish hymn-melody used by Stanford in No. 5 of his 'Six short Preludes and Postludes' (Set 1) is 'Garton.' It will be found in the 'Irish Hymnal,' set to the second part of 'St. Patrick's Breastplate' (No. 346).

L. H.—Schumann's 'In der Nacht': The metronome mark given in Agnes Zimmermann's edition is ♩ = 120. Anything between that and ♩ = 100 will be good.

A. G. M.—In reference to words to the fugue-subjects of the '48,' see reply to 'E. G. D.,' on p. 1118 of the December issue.

QUERIES from 'Fidicen' and others arrived too late for this month.

Miscellaneous

In reference to 'Feste's' query in the article on 'Four-Handed Adventures,' in last month's issue, Dr. Grattan Flood writes as follows: 'It is fairly certain that England can claim the invention of the duet. So far back as 1590, or thereabouts, N. Carlton composed a piece "for two to play on one virginall or organs," and, c. 1605, Thomas Tomkins composed a Fancy "for two performers on one instrument" (Brit. Mus. Add. MSS. 29,996). About the same period (c. 1600), Giles Farnaby wrote a piece for two virginals. In 1704, Bernardo Pasquini composed duets for two clavichords, and Handel wrote a Suite for two harpsichords. Finally, Mozart composed some duets for the pianoforte, in 1765, which set the subsequent vogue.'

It has been suggested that a concert by combined choral societies in and around London should be given in aid of King Edward's Hospital Fund. Secretaries and conductors of societies willing to take part in such a concert are requested to communicate as soon as possible with Mr. E. A. H. Jay, King Edward's Hospital Fund for London, 7, Walbrook, E.C.4. Further details regarding the work to be performed, &c., will be announced in due course, if it is decided to proceed with the scheme. It is hoped that Mr. Allen Gill will consent to give his services as conductor.

'In honour of Thomas Weelkes, organist of Chichester Cathedral, who was buried at St. Bride's on the first day of December, 1623. This tablet was erected by the English Madrigal Societies to commemorate the Tercentenary of his death.' A tablet bearing the above inscription was unveiled at St. Bride's Church, Fleet Street, on December 1.

Mrs. Frank Pownall has given a prize for singers at the Royal College of Music, in memory of her husband, the late Frank Pownall, Registrar of the College from 1896 to 1913. The prize will be competed for at the Annual Examination, the test-pieces being songs by Bach and Schubert.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

THE TIMES.

Congregational singing of the Psalms is difficult to accomplish; the rhythm is neither that of bars nor of musical phrase, but of the literary accent of the verse. The Barless Psalter has been framed with this in view, rejecting as false the idea that an Anglican chant sets the Psalms partly to free recitation and partly to a strict musical measure. Practically it revises Anglican chanting upon the basis of plainsong chanting, holding that the value of the notes must be considered as relative to the value of the syllables. Very few markings, therefore, are required to show the relation between the words and the music, and anyone may quickly master its principles without technical knowledge. From that point of view it should help congregations to join intelligently in Psalms and Canticles.

THE MORNING POST.

In the matter of Church Music there is a notable issue in the form of a "Barless Psalter." The system is simple and the marking clear.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The Barless Psalter is likely to prove a boon to those interested in congregational singing of the Psalms in church, and anxious to improve it. The congregational singing in our Anglican churches is not a feature to be proud of, and a careful study of this capital little book may lead to a better state of affairs. The detailed instructions are comprehensive and simple.

THE GUARDIAN.

The Anglican Church has had to pay heavily during some two centuries or more for the hard and mechanical treatment of Psalms and Canticles brought about by the introduction of the barred music of Anglican Chants . . . in place of the older and more flexible rhythm of unbarred plainsong. The result was . . . to destroy congregational singing . . . and to murder the magnificent prose rhythms of the Psalter. . . . It has been demonstrated that the Anglican Chant can be adequately handled by subordinating the musical accent strictly to the words, and by the selection of appropriate chants. . . . Mr. Marshall . . . makes a more practical suggestion in eliminating the bars from the Anglican Chant, and setting free the rhythm to keep pace with the words. This has certainly much to be said for it,—it is indeed a step forward, if not the last word. He admits stresses on words to mark meaning, but not to harden the time. His book, which has been prepared with the assistance of his capable organist, Mr. Seymour Pile, may be commended to all who are interested in this important feature of our worship.

THE CHURCH TIMES.

A little book has just been published which demands, and deserves, more than passing notice. Published in much the same format as The Cathedral Psalter, it proclaims itself to be The Barless Psalter, pointed for use with Anglican Chants: an Easy Book for Choir and Congregation. Note the last word. . . . The Barless Psalter (in spite of, or because of, its lack of bars) is simplicity itself, and could be rendered with ease by any average village choir and congregation. . . . If I were in the position of a choirmaster and had a free hand, I should scrap my existing stock of Psalters—by this time probably fairly worn-out and meet for destruction—and I should, without doubt, experiment upon this extremely sensible book.

THE ORGANIST AND CHOIRMASTER.

This is quite the best Psalter for Anglican Chants we ever remember to have seen. . . With the suppression of accents during the chant inflexion, it has become possible to avoid to a very large extent the usual objectionable "clatter" on such final words as "righteousness," "testimonies," &c. This fact alone ought to commend the book to the notice of choirmasters who desire to secure smoothness and fluency in their Psalmody. . The Barless Psalter seems to us to be the ne plus ultra of the Anglican chanting system.

MUSICAL OPINION.

In the work now under notice, we see nothing of editorial peculiarities; the whole book is the exposition of a principle,—a sound, reasonable, and intelligible principle such as has been enunciated time after time in theory and almost always missed in practice. The editors certainly are justified when they say in conclusion that they have no apology to offer for this book. It certainly needs none, nor will its use need any justification. It really does seem to succeed where so many other books have failed.

MUSICAL NEWS.

The Barless Psalter is a thoughtful contribution towards the solution of the problem of chanting. It is simple in principle, the pointing is dignified, and as the editors have favoured trochaic endings, the "chattering finals" have been eliminated.

THE CHOIR.

If a suitable system can be devised, there is no reason why the chanting of a psalm should not be almost as easy to the ordinary congregation as the singing of a metrical hymn; and the nearest approach to the required simplicity will, we think, be found in the Barless Psalter. . . . The Barless Psalter clearly foreshadows a better state of things, and with its help the day should not be far distant when the chanting of the psalms is as easy an exercise as the singing of a hymn.

PAXTON'S EDITION

OF

BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS

EDITED BY F. CORDER, F.R.A.M.

Assisted by

CARLO ALBANESI, F.R.A.M. OSCAR BERINGER, F.R.A.M. T. A. MATTHAY, F.R.A.M.

Every musician knows the names of the four men who have sponsored this, the latest edition of Beethoven's immortal Pianoforte Sonatas. They are professors of international repute, acknowledged authorities of the art of pianoforte instruction and performance. Many of the finest pianists of the day owe their position to the sound tuition they received at the hands of Mr. Frederick Corder and his co-editors, and the wisdom of their ripe experience of every phase of pianoforte technique has been brought to bear on the compilation of this splendid edition and the analytical notes that accompany it.

These are not the men to take liberties with Beethoven under the plea of "interpretation," but they most emphatically are the men to produce an edition which every teacher can be assured is thoroughly reliable and pianistic in the best sense.

OLD ENGLISH

VIOLIN MUSIC

EDITED BY

ALFRED MOFFAT.

PREFATORY NOTE.

Although considerable attention has been given to the resuscitation of Church Music, Glees and Madrigals, Organ and even Harpsichord Music by the older English composers, very little has been done to make known the large mass of music for the Violin written by English musicians from the time of Purcell to the close of the 18th century. These works for the most part consist of Suites or Sonatas written for a solo violin with a figured bass, or for two violins and violoncello with a figured bass for the harpsichord or organ; another favourite form was the Concerto grosso.

It is with the object of making known to the public a selection of the best of these compositions that the present series has been undertaken. ALFRED MOFFAT.

OF SPECIAL INTEREST TO ORGANISTS

When Mendelssohn was in Edinburgh he met Henry E. Dibdin who took him to Trinity Church to try the organ. On returning to Germany, Mendelssohn sent him this little organ prelude. Mendelssohn died a few years later, and H. E. Dibdin had a few copies lithographed by our firm. In order that every organist may possess a copy of this unique example of the Master's skill in writing for the organ we have decided to republish it.

OF SPECIAL INTEREST TO COMPOSERS

Throughout the year we are compelled to decline many compositions, not because we do not recognise their merit but because we consider it improbable that the sales would cover the cost of publication.

To meet these cases and to enable composers to try their fortune in print, we have instituted a COMPOSER'S PROPERTY DEPARTMENT. Send postcard for particulars.

YOUR SUCCESS GUARANTEED.

That very common fault—

"STIFFNESS"—IS IMPOSSIBLE.

"One cannot develop bad habits under your system, and the pianist's most common fault and stumbling block, "STIFFNESS," is impossible."—Extract from a pupil's letter.

MAKE 1925 A YEAR OF REAL PROGRESS.

As a pianist, student, or teacher, what are you doing? You cannot afford to stand still—YOU must be abreast of the times—YOUR playing and teaching must be on MODERN PROGRESSIVE LINES—the solution for EVERY DIFFICULTY must be at your finger tips.

How often has some difficulty presented itself to you, and you have wished to discuss it with an expert?

HERE IS YOUR OPPORTUNITY.

THE CHARLES A. GILLETT SPECIALISED CORRESPONDENCE LESSONS IN MODERN PIANOFORTE PLAYING will help you in every conceivable difficulty. Its success cannct be doubted in the face of the numerous letters of appreciation received from Mus. Docs., Mus. Bacs., and others of all degrees. THOROUGHNESS and EXPLICITLY DETAILED INSTRUCTION are the GUIDING CHARACTERISTICS.

Every earnest pianist should at any rate keep an open mind as to the efficiency of these Courses until he investigates them—he will then be firmly convinced that Mr. Gillett's methods are quite unique.

Many valuable and important additions have now been made to the Charles A. Gillett Correspondence Course in Modern Pianoforte Playing. This now forms a most perfect method for the busy teacher, amateur or professional student.

MR. CHARLES TREE

LECTURES ON THE ART OF EASE IN SINGING.

Halifax. Mr. Asking. Secretary, Nov. 8, 1924.—"It was greatly enjoyed by the crowded and finely appreciative audience. It was something more than delightful and educative—it was unsurpassable in its popular appeal."

Barrow. Mr. Metcalf, Secretary, Oct. 30, 1924.—"It drew a record audience for our association, appealing strongly to both young and old, to the musical expert and to the layman. It is of outstanding merit."

MR. ALBERT GARCIA

LESSONS IN VOICE PRODUCTION AND SINGING

Special Coaching in Opera, Oratorio, and for Recitals.
Pupils prepared for A.R.C.M. and L.R.A.M. Exams.

"A number of Mr. Albert Garcia's pupils sang excellently at the concert which they gave on Wednesday evening. It was particularly pleasant to hear voices so well placed and well poised, smooth and even in tone from the lowest to the highest notes, showing a control which too few learn to exercise."—Daily Telegraph.

"One takes it that a concert by pupils fulfils its object if it demonstrates—as the one given at Wigmore Hall by Singers studying with Mr. Albert Garcia certainly did—the excellence of that master's method"—Era.

"Mr. Garcia—himself a fine artist and inheritor of a great tradition and a great name—has some most promising pupils, and such singers as Miss Rosa Burn and Mr. Frederick Lippold show in what an excellent school they have been trained."—Daily Telegraph.

THE TECHNIQUER

FOR STRETCH, STRENGTH, AND SUPPLENESS.

CARL WEBER, the renowned teacher says:

"After a trial, I find 'The Techniquer' an admirable means of lessening the drudgery of a pianist's daily gymnastics. The exercises have the effect of strengthening the fingers to a remarkable degree, the result being that confidence and power are greatly increased, while effort is reduced and time saved. I recommend your excellent invention wherever I can, and with every confidence."

PIANO PEDALS, with Octave Coupler

This wonderful invention supersedes all Piano Pedals, and is a Master Patent.
St. George's Hall, Liverpool,
9th April, 1921.

"The simplicity of the attachment, and the clever sixteen-feet, eight-feet, or both combined, 'OPTIONAL OCTAVE' contrivance, astonished me.

"I was delighted with the Pedal touch and with the variety in that touch, which your Attachment makes possible. It is very responsive to the movements of the feet, and is reliable."

MODERN CORR. COLLEGE

Principal: ARTHUR McALISTER, B.A. (Cantab.).

Letters of appreciation from SUCCESSFUL CANDIDATES at the ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS' EXAMINATIONS.

FAILED TWICE BEFORE JOINING M.C.C.

"Dear Mr. McAlister,

"I am writing to thank you for your kind letter congratulating me on my A.R.C.O. success.

"I had previously failed twice, but thanks to your excellent hints and methods of preparation I was successful.

"I am sure no one has much chance of failure in your hands, for you seem to anticipate exactly the type of work required by the examiners."

F.R.C.O. (NOT ONE OF A CROWD).

"From beginning to end I never felt that I was merely one of a crowd, for the criticism and advice received from the M.C.C. always responded to my particular troubles. I went into the examination room feeling confident that 'nothing could me dismay,' and I am ready to prepare for L.R.A.M. and Mus. Bac."

F.R.C.O. BEST TUTORS IN THE COUNTRY.

"Many thanks for your extremely lucid criticism of the music paper. Have had lessons from some of the best coaches in the country, but never in such a detailed and instructive manner."

F.R.C.O.

"I attribute much of my success to the fact that your systematic methods of dealing with my work have enabled me to see exactly where I stood with regard to the standard of work required. One of the many excellent features of your course is that in addition to pointing out the faults of the various exercises, you give most detailed instructions as to how these can be avoided, and also model workings of the papers. I have found your remarks on Orchestration very valuable."

A.R.C.O.

"I did not experience any difficulty this time with the Counterpoint. Your system of teaching it has made interesting to me a subject which before I detested."

A.R.C.O.

"You will be pleased to hear that I was successful in obtaining the A.R.C.O. diploma last week. I thank you very much for the invaluable help I have received from your course. I had little hope of getting through when I first wrote to you. In fact I merely wanted to go up to see what it was like!"

A.R.C.O.

"I have really made more progress with you in three months than in two years under my old tutor, a Mus. Doc."

A.R.C.O. 5TH ATTEMPT.

"I am glad to inform you that I was successful in passing the A.R.C.O. Exam. under your valuable tuition. Previous to my joining the M.C.C. last March, I had made four attempts at the exam. and failed each time, so please accept my grateful thanks."

A.R.C.O.

"I am glad to say I have passed A.R.C.O. at the recent exam., and am now ready to work up for Fellowship, July next. I feel certain that I shall pass in the Paper Work, because the first time I attempted the A.R.C.O. under your excellent tuition I passed, although I had failed before. I have recommended the M.C.C. to several friends lately."

A.R.C.O.

"With reference to the Paper Work, I cannot express my belief in your system too strongly. My Counterpoint until I came to you was awful, and I despaired of ever being able to write fluently and tunefully."

A.R.C.O.

"I owe my success to the valuable hints and thorough criticism of your tutor. I do not think I shall be so long over the Fellowship, for I know that I am studying on the right lines."

A.R.C.O.

"I am glad to tell you that I was successful at the exam. for A.R.C.O. held this week, and must thank you for the help you have given me in the Paper Work."

A.R.C.O.

"I should like to say that I am highly delighted with the tuition I have received from you, and in fact, I could not wish for better, if better could be obtained. I have found the tuition extremely helpful in the points which not only show musicianship, but gain marks at examinations, such as imitation canon and sequential treatment, and the use I made of these devices undoubtedly enabled me to pass this examination."

Candidates who have FAILED TO PASS are invited to write to the Principal. State weak subjects.

"Could not memorise a single note . . . . Can now play Scriabin from memory."

THIS is just one letter typical of hundreds received from pianists and organists who have overcome their memorising difficulties through taking the Mackinnon Musical Memory Course.

Players who have previously been unable to master the simplest piece, after taking the Course learn difficult music easily and quickly. And this is not all. The thorough grasp of the music given by the Mackinnon System of Memory Training banishes nervousness. Players who have never been able to do themselves justice before an audience play without fear of breakdown.

Technique is improved. A new sense of freedom results in full artistic self-expression for the first time.

The Course consists of Six clearly written Correspondence Lessons. Only fifteen minutes' daily practice is required. There is no drudgery of any kind.

Send Coupon below for free booklet, to-day.

MACKINNON'S MUSICAL MEMORY COURSE

EMPIRE HOUSE. 175 PICCADILLY. W.1.

GUARANTEE

If, within four weeks from the receipt of the first lesson, and before the receipt of the second, any Student feels that he or she has not already made definite progress as a result of taking the Course, such Student's fees will be refunded in full.

Just a few of the appreciative letters received daily. You can be equally successful:

From a Cathedral Organist.
"Many students of the organ find it difficult to accompany the Psalms satisfactorily. To those who find it so, I recommend this memory Course."

From a Pianist.
"Your method makes one feel it is impossible to break down."

From a Teacher.
"Prior to your lessons I found it impossible to memorise any piece. I can now learn and play with confidence and ease."

From a Church Organist.
"Of the greatest assistance, cannot fail to play from memory where your instructions are followed."

F.R.C.O. AND A.R.C.O. PAPER WORK.

A SPECIAL COURSE OF CORRESPONDENCE LESSONS for the JULY, 1925, F.R.C.O. and A.R.C.O. Examinations is now commencing. The chief reason why this system of tuition is so successful is that pupils are taught how to work. Experience has proved that a large number of candidates fail because they do not reach a high enough standard in their work.

Special attention given to the Pianoforte Accompaniment Test, as most organ students fail to utilize the distinctive idioms of pianoforte writing, and make their work look like an organ accompaniment.

F.R.C.O. pupils are trained to work on a definite plan in such tests as Episode and Middle Entries, Stretto, and Song Writing, so as to acquire speed, which is a most vital factor, especially in the afternoon paper.

All the new tests will be covered in these lessons, and complete musical illustrations will be sent to each candidate showing exactly what the examiners require.

The whole aim of this method is to teach the principles which underlie all highly artistic music, and also the application of these principles to examination work, so that a pupil who is thus equipped is enabled not only to pass the F.R.C.O. or A.R.C.O. examination, as the case may be, but also to develop to the utmost the musical ability with which he is endowed.

THE "DISCUS" ORGAN BLOWER

Is installed and giving complete satisfaction in over a thousand Cathedrals, Churches, Theatres, and Cinemas in Great Britain alone. This fact is eloquent, as well as convincing testimony, to its efficiency and durability. It is the most satisfactory method of mechanical organ blowing, and as the motive power may be oil, gas, or electric motor, the "Discus" is suitable for churches in any locality. The application of a "Discus" equipment to an organ ensures a steady supply of wind being instantly available, and enables the organist to obtain the best possible effects from the instrument. The "Discus" blower is the most scientifically designed machine for organ blowing purposes on the market. It is made of metal throughout, of the best quality combined with high grade workmanship. Being entirely free of complicated mechanism, a minimum of attention is required, and very many years of satisfactory services ensured. Efficiency and reliability are fully guaranteed with each "Discus" equipment we instal.

Admission to Concerts and Recitals free to the public.

The College provides INSTRUCTION and TRAINING in all Musical Subjects (Instrumental, Vocal, and Theoretical) and Dramatic and Operatic Elocution. The Lessons are arranged to meet the convenience of both day and evening students. Entry may be made for any number of Subjects—from one to the Full Course. The College is open to beginners as well as to the more proficient student; pupils under 16 years of age are received for the Junior School at reduced fees.

The ORCHESTRAL, CHORAL, the OPERATIC, and CHAMBER MUSIC CLASSES are open also to sufficiently competent persons who are not College Students for other subjects.

Tuition in the Rudiments of the Theory of Music, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Instrumentation, Composition, and the Art of Teaching is also given by Correspondence.

The Clergy Voice-Training Class meets on Mondays, and is conducted by DR. GEORGE OLDROYD.

A special Class for Scoring for Brass and Military Bands, and the Theatre Orchestra, is conducted by Mr. HENRY GEEHL.

There are between Forty and Fifty Scholarships tenable at the College and open to all British subjects up to certain age limits, and the Bambridge Pianoforte Scholarship, value £100 per annum; also Eighteen Scholarships which provide complete preparation for the Degree of Bachelor of Music.

Particulars of the Teaching Department, with list of Professors, Fees, Scholarships regulations, &c., and the Syllabuses of the Diploma and Local Examinations, free on application to the undersigned

GRESHAM ESSAYS

BY WALFORD DAVIES

(Gresham Lecturer in Music)

I.—MUSICAL PERSPECTIVE

Under this title the Editor kindly allows me to broadcast to his numberless Musical Times 'listeners-in' some of the things said in the course of Gresham lectures which may possibly prove to be of interest to a wider circle of music-lovers if put into essay form

ESSAYS NEEDED

It is clear that we live in a musically seething time. New chords arrive, so to speak, by every post. It is obviously not enough to receive these new riches casually, perhaps even to use them experimentally ourselves, and then leave them lying about in our minds. To put it in another way, it is not enough to enlarge our vocabulary with no corresponding effort to increase our mental grip. Luckily the human passion for clear thought, for mental mastery, seems as indomitable as is our passion for experiences. The healthy child—and the real musical public is surely a healthy child—wants more than merely to hear the musical watch tick, more than to tell the time by its face; it likes to 'see the wheels go round,' and even to handle the wonderful thing. To meet this inquiring spirit, Dr. Dyson's recent book 'The New Music,' comes as a most welcome boon, and will doubtless be eagerly read and re-read by every one thoroughly interested in present-day musical progress. Such level-headed Essays on Music can never have been more timely than they are now, except possibly in the post-Palestrina period in Italy.

Obviously we do not need at this moment the essays of a cautiously-learned professor on the musical situation. His day is either gone or not yet come. Nor, I believe, is there any very substantial help to be found in the essays of the incautious hero-worshipper, Mr. So-and-So, who with apparently unbounded self-confidence (dear man!) will assure us exactly, not what we should think of music, but what we should think of individual composers, whom he is then pulverising or praising.

Our essayists, at the moment, will perhaps help us most if they will neither fear to give themselves away, nor hope to impose themselves upon us—essayists like Grove, who, with equal humility, continually give themselves away, and set as incurably little store upon what they can give as he did. The musical writer of to-day needs to be an enthusiastic child in the Kingdom of Music, prattling intelligently to us: not a childish prattler about one spot on the musical globe; but an open-eared, open-minded traveller in the world of sound; a fearless, child-like receiver of every musical impression he can take in—an equal lover of things new and old, a simple, 'silly fellow' who actually thinks the world of music as measureless and as varied as the visible universe he looks out upon, if only it can be discovered. And this brings me to the immediate subject of this essay, namely, the musician's urgent need for cultivating the faculty corresponding to that which artists call perspective.

MUSICAL PERSPECTIVE

Painters acquire a power of looking through (or perspecting) a picture. There is undoubtedly a similar power given to men to hear through (di-audit) a piece of music. Painters take time to look into space. We stand in space as they do, but we gaze with our ears into time. Gazing, we need a right sense of relation, as they do. We must momentarily call this sense the power of musical perspective. 'Look with your ears' is always a good motto, but it is necessary to look knowingly, remembering to allow for the equivalent of perspective. (A Latin scholar assures me that the right word is either Di-audition or Di-auscultation—both very alarming terms!)

There is keen sight, and there is keen hearing. And as there is a defect known as short-sightedness, so we can recognise the corresponding defect of short-hearingness. Some people can see miles and miles into space. Do we not possess and need to cultivate a corresponding power of hearing long reaches into time? Happy are the critics of the daily papers if they only acquire this one power of 'di-auscultation' as a reward for the dreary duty of incessant concert-going.

The conditions of looking with the eyes into space and looking with the ears into time are of course inherently different. Yet they have useful resemblances; and the desirability of far-hearing and clear-hearing is as great for an intelligent lover of sound and music as that of far-sight and clear-sight for an intelligent lover of scenery and pictures. A music-lover needs to allow for temporal perspective (or looking into time) as well as for spatial perspective.

What is meant by allowing for the accepted spatial perspective? Take a simple example. If you are walking at night and see a welcome candle in a cottage window half a mile off, and at the same time see the planet Mars gloriously setting, you allow for perspection, i.e., you will not forget or stupidly under-rate the fact that Mars is bright to the eyes of millions simply because your little candle happens to be brighter still to the eyes of one. If you do forget it, your values will be unreliable to other men.

In the same way temporal perspective has to be allowed for as a perpetual and not a casual factor in our musical judgment. Who is not familiar with this need in some form or other? The effect of the last-heard work on the ear, and through it on the mind, may momentarily eclipse the far-away masterpiece as surely as a small rock when you pass it by the roadside will momentarily eclipse Mont Blanc. Every looker upon nature knows how to allow for perspective; more than that, he knows how to enjoy all its delicious vistas and mystic comparisons. In the same way the looker with his ears upon music must know how to allow for musical perspective or di-auscultation, and for all the lovely relations of tones which result from it.

DISTINCTION BETWEEN PHYSICAL AND MENTAL PERSPECTIVE

But here it is urgent clearly to distinguish between two essentially different perspectives—perhaps between three: (1) the physical or purely personal; (2) the mental, capable of being impersonal; and there is to reckon with a supermental one, viz., (3) the imaginative perspective, the power indescribable that rises to be not only what we call impersonal, but even personless, and at the last (we must believe) perfected.

There are physical avenues in space for all of us. Down these avenues the physical eye of any one of us may and does look daily (a few miles at most) along any radius of our particular visual circumference to any particular vanishing point in any particular moment of time. Furthermore, science gives us telescopes and microscopes to extend this physical vision both towards the infinite and towards the infinitesimal. Yet the visionary minds and radiant imaginations of men, in books and sonatas, do far more for us than this.

The physical perspective of each of us is necessarily a bounded personal thing; mental and imaginative perspective are not necessarily so bounded. Indeed, in our experience they lead us continually to the edge of the boundless and impersonal. Thus astronomers can use their mental vision till their own bodies become to them a negligible speck on a planet, which in its turn is a speck chipped off a sun, which is a speck in a system, which system can actually be grasped by their imagination. Though lying vastly beyond the physical vision, it yet lies easily within the imaginative vision.

If it has been my good fortune so far to have made this important distinction clear enough here to serve the reader's own purposes, let him now carefully apply it to music. But first let me put forward one more reminder of the tiresome but crucial fact that, though a picture is seen in time as well as in space, and conversely, though a sonata is heard somewhere in space as well as in time, yet the fact remains, that, looking at Michael Angelo's art, we virtually stand still in time in order to look into space, while, looking at Beethoven's art, we stand still in space to look into time. The painter momentarily ignores or becomes unconscious of time. The musician momentarily ignores or becomes unconscious of space. The significance of this fact may be put in one sentence —while the eye can observe art completed, the ear can only observe complete art in process.

PHYSICAL PERSPECTIVE IN MUSIC

Here (with the reservation just mentioned) the artist's analogy can give musicians direct help. If a man looks, for example, at a series of poles thirty feet high, set at fixed distances from him —say fifty yards apart—receding to the utmost visible distance on his horizon, then the poles that look long in the foreground will look shorter and shorter in the middle distance, till on the far horizon they will look mere specks on the landscape, without either thickness or length. As he sees the poles get shorter, thinner, and fainter, the factor in art called Perspective is quite clear to him, and he is ready permanently to reckon with it. Yes, and even the subtler but very real factor, vaguely called atmosphere, the sight of which seems the last achievement of the fine art of perspecting, or looking through things—even atmosphere may become clear to any artist's patient and persevering eye in the same way, so that gradually all his pictorial values come right; at the last he gets truth for his reward.

Now turn to a musical landscape. Let a man look with his physical ears into time as hard and piercingly as he looked with his physical eyes into space. Let him gaze at the same musical object at different distances—say, for example, at a scale an octave high and four beats long:

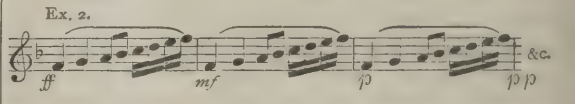
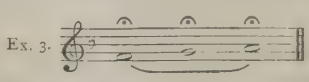
Let this object be set up (i.e., sounded) at regularly receding distances from him—say thirty feet—but played with the same loudness at each distance. The following will be the result to his ear*:

Ex. 2.



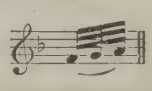
From this example we see at once that looking into time, though necessarily different from looking into space, is not wholly different—for the objects in the time-landscape do grow thinner and fainter to the ear exactly as the objects in the space-landscape did to the eye. But by their very nature they won't grow shorter in time as the poles grew shorter in space; or rather, if we try to make them grow shorter in time, we are bound to make a different thing of them, because this:

Ex. 3.



never can be the same as:

Ex. 4.



* It is unnecessary here to consider the rate at which sound travels, since it is obviously irrelevant at the moment.

any more than an old, old man can be the same as a brisk little child; and this for the simple reason that speed is naturally of the very essence of the contract in an art that draws its pictures in terms of energy on a canvas of time.

Physical perspective in music is therefore reduced at its simplest to a question of relative thinness or thickness (pp or ff), and of faintness or clearness—that is, in the details heard.

The above example seems to bring to light a practical hint, which may be put here in the form of a question to teachers: Should not crescendo, diminuendo, and all nuance be to the composer, performer, and hearer alike, exactly what perspective is to the painter and to the intelligent lover of pictures? This is only to ask: Should not all right-headed expression make its right responsible impression? To put it primitively for beginners: I can imagine many a good teacher to have said, even to his elementary pupils, 'Always look at your musical picture while you make it, and bear in mind that your ff is bound to be in your hearer's foreground, your mf in his middle distance, and your pp in his lovely horizon.'

Two personal experiences bearing on this point may be useful. I remember inviting two counterpoint pupils from the Royal College of Music to play on a Bechstein grand in a small drawing room. Both were fine pianists; but only one instinctively subdued his output to the needs of his hearers in a small room, producing fullness without confusion. The other played with fine, unthinking vigour, and he was perhaps the better musician—but he bored everybody in the room. This was years ago. The first is now a noted pianist; the second would perhaps have learned good sense for life, if I had only had the nous and courtesy to tell him that his playing, though fine, was all foreground, and therefore a cruel distortion of Brahms's picture; if only I had told him to learn perspective. The other incident was with Temple choirboys in their small practice-room adjoining the Church. I was on that occasion hard put to it to get them to understand a subtle piece of choral writing. Phrase by phrase it had to recede. I suddenly said, 'Put this phrase into the Church, put the next beyond the Church, put the third on the Embankment, and put the last on the south side of the river.' The result was startlingly perfect. The boys had achieved di-auscultation for themselves.

And while speaking upon practical matters, one cannot but reflect here upon the present appalling screaming habit of multitudes of our good vocalists. Of course, composers are much to blame. A learned judge who loved Greek once said to me, 'I went to the new opera in order to hear the Greek play [Strauss's 'Elektra']. They screamed for an hour and three-quarters, and I came away.' Many of our singers with the best voices nowadays come into small-sized rooms, or even class-rooms, and callously scream the listeners mentally hoarse, and any little child could tell them the folly of it. I used to imagine that only corporal punishment could cure the perverse singer who exhibits his or her vast vocal organ as a fruiterer might exhibit the largest pumpkin ever grown. Personally they remind me of a great passage in Parry's 'Voces clamantium,' where woe is declared to them who 'draw iniquity with c(h)ords of vanity, and sin(g) as it were with a cart-rope, and call evil good.' But is it not astonishing to reflect that possibly the real, simple, and quite permanent cure lies in the universal cultivation among children of the barest notions of di-auscultation?

Before leaving the question of physical distances in music, it is curious to reflect what might have happened if speed of utterance on the canvas of time made no essential difference to the phrase uttered. Of one thing we may feel certain; we should in such a case have had totally different sonatas and symphonies from Beethoven, whose grip of musical perspective seems outstanding and amazing. But here it is entrancing to notice that even in the realm of physical impression it is sometimes possible at least to simulate shortening of phrase without actually changing the speed-impression, and without much changing the especial object observed. Thus such a passage as this:

is almost, but not quite, as void of all other interest as a line of telegraph posts seen along the Bath Road; that is, it stands as a fair simulation of objects arranged in perspective to the ear on the canvas of time, growing naturally and noticeably fainter, but also taking up less space in time. For interest and completeness yet another simulated shortening of the musical height of the object set up may be suggested here. It also resembles a receding avenue of musical lines—not wholly unlike a receding avenue of poplars in a landscape:

But however gradual or slight the changes made, it is useless to pretend that the passage is not materially changed. And certainly to play these examples over, keeping strict but unlaboured time, and observing the steady diminuendo, is to pass naturally from the mere observation of physical perspective in time to thoughts about the far more potent, interesting, complex, difficult matter of mental perspective in music. There seems no doubt that the mind observes things in as habitual a perspective of its own as ever the eye or the ear can do.

THAT 'PLAYED OUT' THEORY

By Hugh Arthur Scott

It is sometimes advanced as an excuse, if not a justification, for some of the more monstrous exercises offered the public nowadays in the name of music, that on its accepted lines the art is now played out. Everything, it is declared, that can be said on the existing lines has been said, and composers have no alternative accordingly but to try new directions altogether.

Is there any truth in this? No doubt to many a young composer—and to many an older one too—the notion commends itself as painfully true the while he cudgels his brains in vain to find anything whatsoever to say which has not been said before. And the concert-goer may well be excused also, if he feels no less convinced of its soundness when wearied by the vain and seemingly hopeless search for something genuinely original among the hundreds of so-called 'new' works annually submitted for judgment.

Certainly too it is easy to realise that it may well be more difficult to invent fresh music now than it was in earlier ages—before all the old masters and others had explored and exploited all the more obvious possibilities of the art.

Similarly one may say that the task of the earlier poets must have been vastly less hard than that of their 20th-century successors, who have come upon the scene only when all the most obvious reflections have been made, the best rhymes bagged, and so on. Nevertheless, great poets do continue to appear as the generations run on, and do contrive to find something new to say; and so it has been also hitherto in the case of music.

In this matter indeed the composer has a distinct advantage over the poet, inasmuch as in the case of music the materials and resources of the art are undergoing a process of continuous expansion and development to an extent which is totally unknown in the case of poetry.

In other words, if the composer of each succeeding generation finds himself up against all the great music which has been written by his forerunners, he enjoys at least the advantage of having at his command resources in the matter of harmony, treatment, and so forth, of which they knew nothing.

Thus Beethoven used chords which would have been simply incomprehensible to Handel, but which were quite agreeable to the hearers of his own generation. Wagner in turn advanced on Beethoven in just the same way, as more recent composers have advanced again on Wagner. And so it goes on continually in music, each generation building on the ground already won and extending it still further in new directions.

In poetry, on the other hand, there is little or nothing of the same kind to offer any sort of analogy. The poet of the present day must use practically the same vocabulary as Shakespeare and Milton, as Dryden and Pope, and to this extent therefore he would seem to be even worse placed than the musician to produce anything original.

Yet rather curiously it is the musician who seems to be the more acutely conscious of his difficulties and of the paralysing influence of the past—at the present time, that is to say, for in earlier days this was far from being the case. Quite the contrary; down to comparatively recent times there never lacked great masters capable of writing music absolutely individual and completely different from that which had been written before.

Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Chopin, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Wagner, Brahms—it is necessary only to cite the famous names to be convinced of the truth of this statement. Why is it then that it should be found necessary to raise such a plea as that which I have referred to on behalf of the modern composer? Why should he find it so much more difficult than his predecessors to break fresh ground?

In a word, is there anything in this suggestion that music on existing lines is exhausted? Or is it not more properly to be regarded as a feeble excuse for those who do not happen to have anything fresh to say? One is indeed rather reminded in this connection of the school-boy who, called on to write a Latin essay, explained that unfortunately all his views on the subject prescribed had been anticipated by Cicero. It is so fatally easy for those not favoured with new ideas to conclude that there is nothing more to be said.

But you never find the really big men complaining in this way, even after a life-time of creative labour—though in that case there would be nothing surprising if they did find their powers exhausted. In actual fact, however, it was almost invariably quite the other way with them.

Thus Haydn, dying at seventy-seven after having composed incessantly all his life, told Griesinger in his last years that though he was failing physically he had by no means come to the end of his creative powers. On the contrary, ideas were in his mind, he said, by which he could have carried the art far beyond anything it had yet attained. And Beethoven, in turn spoke to much the same effect—as when, in a letter to Schott, he wrote: 'I feel as if I had scarcely written more than a few notes.'

Here certainly is nothing to support the 'played out' theory. Who can doubt indeed that had Beethoven lived longer—and he was only fifty-six when he died—he would have given us other works as great as, if not actually greater than, any which he actually wrote? Sketches for a tenth symphony are of course actually in existence, while he is known to have contemplated further an overture on the name of Bach, a Requiem Mass, and music to 'Faust,' among other things. These and other masterpieces (as they doubtless would have been) are lost to us, not because Beethoven had exhausted his creative powers, but simply because he was not spared to write them.

And what applies to masters like Haydn and Beethoven is still more manifestly true of composers such as Mozart, Schubert, Chopin, and Mendelssohn, who all died so much younger.

Take the case of Schubert, who was cut off at thirty-one. Every one knows the lines of Grillparzer inscribed on his grave: 'Music has here entombed a rich treasure but much fairer hopes.' And who can doubt the justice of this epitaph? Consider the works which he produced in the last twelve months of his unparalleled life. They include, as Grove put it, 'his greatest known Symphony, his finest piece of chamber music, his greatest and longest Mass, his first oratorio, three noble Pianoforte Sonatas, and some of his finest songs.'

Who can compute what additional treasures Schubert might have left us had he lived another twenty or thirty years?

And the same applies more or less to all the other great masters. However long their days we may be sure that they would always have gone on adding to their previous creations. Verdi at seventy-nine gave us 'Falstaff.' Wagner wrote 'Parsifal' at sixty-nine. Brahms's last compositions, such as the glorious Clarinet Quintet, are among his very greatest. And all these works we may be sure would have been added to, and even surpassed, if only their creators had been permitted to live longer.

What nonsense, then, is this talk of music being played out, and of its possibilities having been exhausted! If it was not exhausted for Wagner and Brahms and Verdi to the end of their days, why should it suddenly be found incapable of further development by their successors? Why indeed?

The futher consideration that a certain number of composers of the present day are in point of fact continuing to produce new music of value might also of course be touched on. But that is another aspect of the matter which for the purpose of the present argument it is unnecessary to go into. I am concerned for the moment merely to point out that down to quite recent times there never was any thought, so far as the acknowledged great masters were concerned, of the exhaustion or the exhaustibility of music.

Those interested in the operatic side of Handel's work should note that 'Semele' will be performed at the Theatre, Cambridge, on February 10-14, conducted by Dr. Cyril Rootham. There will be a matinée on February 14. In view of this revival, we are glad to be able to include in the present issue an article by Mr. Barclay Squire, dealing with 'Semele.'

LISZT'S 'FAUST' SYMPHONY

By M.-D. Calvocoressi

I shall begin my survey of Liszt's neglected masterpieces with his 'Faust' Symphony. This is a little better known in this country than the 'Dante' Symphony, but opportunities to hear it remain very few. The only practical way of getting acquainted with it is to read the score; or, better, to procure an arrangement for pianoforte solo or pianoforte duet, and play it or have it played. Although essentially conceived and carried out as an orchestral work, it will be found to stand the test quite well, except that a few repetitions, which in actual orchestral performance fall into place quite naturally, will perhaps be found to drag in the pianoforte arrangement.

I well remember how at Paris, during the 'nineties, Risler and Cortôt carried out splendid Liszt-propaganda by giving performances of the 'Faust' and 'Dante' Symphonies arranged for two pianofortes, and with the assistance of a small choir for the choral Finales. These performances were the origin of my deep love for Liszt's music—a love which since then has never ceased to grow. Something of the kind might well be attempted to-day by circles of music-lovers. I am sure that it would set the ball rolling, and create for orchestral performances a demand which concert organizers could not for ever ignore.

The 'Faust' Symphony is usually acknowledged as one of Liszt's best and most thoroughly representative works, although it has been criticised as mercilessly as any other. Even those writers who have not a single good word for it from the purely musical point of view agree that, as a musical comment of its 'programme,' it is remarkably telling. But let us take this point for granted and start where programme talk usually leaves off, viz., with the music as music pure and simple—for it is as such that Liszt's true votaries declare it admirable.

This music has been criticised on three grounds: the quality of the themes, the methods of dealing with the themes, and the form.

Thus to establish a sharp distinction between the working-out and the form is not altogether sound—for, when all is said and done, the two are interdependent. But we are only following Liszt's censors on their own chosen ground.

Last month I quoted Parry's view that in the 'Faust' Symphony themes 'were not used for purposes of defining the artistic form.' If we try to analyse this saying, we cannot fail to see that its meaning depends on that of the word 'define,' which in turn is not quite so unequivocal as one might wish. What is really meant is that the themes are not devised and handled in accordance with the definite rules governing the treatment of usual forms. Mr. Scott Goddard once referred to Brahms in the following terms:

> He seems at times to have used a tune for its desirability as a vehicle for contrapuntal devices rather than for its beauty of inspired form; and, slave to his ancestry, to have pinched and cut, docked and deformed, his tunes in order to fit them into a 'scheme.'

This quotation ought to make it clear that Parry's criticism, even if taken at its face value, is not so damning as it appears to be.

On the other hand, it may signify that in Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony, the form is imposed from without, instead of being evolved from within. This may be true in appearance—as it is, indeed, of all programme music without exception—but we should not trust to mere appearances. In point of fact, the planning and carrying out of the 'Faust' Symphony are perfectly satisfactory from the purely musical point of view. Nothing, for instance, could be more musicianly than the way in which the themes circulate throughout the work; and their transformations are fraught with musical interest. The way in which the themes of the first movement, strikingly altered in character, are used to novel purposes in the Finale, while the main theme of the second movement is husbanded in order to serve as principal element in the magnificent choral conclusion, is a wonder of purely musical imagination, quite apart from any question of the programmatic or symbolic value of the scheme.

It has been written by Mr. Fuller-Maitland (in the article 'Liszt,' in 'Grove's Dictionary') that > . . . the system of 'Transformation of Themes' is beyond question an easier thing to handle than the logical development which the older masters preferred. Even when it is used by a master of construction, it has evidently little to do with musical interest of the best kind.

The second of these propositions is altogether a matter of taste. As to the first, with due respect to Mr. Fuller-Maitland, I shall say that it is both untenable in principle and confuted by facts. As mechanical processes, both working-out and transformation are equally easy. The former is perhaps a shade easier to learn, because it may be conducted on safe, stereotyped lines; and tell-tale differences between the mechanically-contrived imitation (often described as Kapellmeister-Musik) and the genuine article are not easily discernible. A mechanically-contrived transformation, or a theme mechanically contrived for transformation purposes, generally gives itself away at first sight—far more plainly than the themes mechanically contrived for working-out purposes to which I have shown Mr. Scott Goddard referring.

But if the hall-mark of good form and good treatment is continuity of interest, then indeed we may agree that there is no difference in principle between transformation and working out. Moreover, it would be a mistake to think that Liszt does not resort to both as need arises.

Mr. Ernest Newman very rightly wrote (Musical Times, November, 1911):

> Critics of Liszt's form would do well to remember that perfect form is extremely rare, even in the great classical writers. Any number of examples of bad building in Beethoven or Brahms would not turn some of Liszt's obvious faults into virtues; but before we condemn him for often failing as a movement-builder, we need to remember that the law by which he is tried is itself imperfect, and the judges who administer it are often very fallible, even when they are not wilfully blind.

And music-lovers who take the trouble to examine the 'Faust' Symphony carefully and without prejudice, will very probably agree with the same critic's statement (Musical Times, December, 1911):

> It was no bungler in form who cast the vital substance of Goethe's 'Faust' into a form at once so concise and comprehensive as that of the 'Faust' Symphony.

There remains the question of the musical value of the themes and their transformations and other adventures.

The opening theme:

Ex. 1.

has been described by certain writers as a rather mechanical sequence; by others as a thing of inspired and prophetic beauty. It is Wagner, perhaps, who paid the highest tribute to its expressive significance by transplanting it, practically unaltered, in the second Act of 'Die Walküre,' thus:

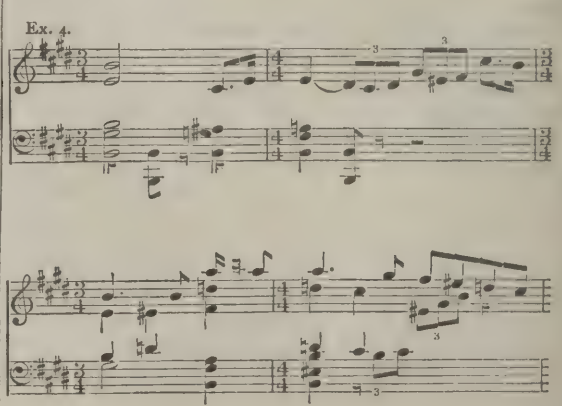
Ex. 2.

As for the second theme:

Ex. 3.

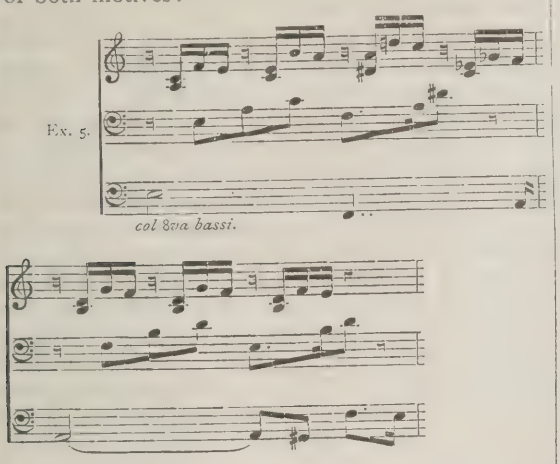
it is very beautiful and expressive in its extreme simplicity. And there can be no doubt, I think, that its various transformations are rich in 'musical interest of the best kind.' They are the outcome of genuine musical imagination. Here is a first instance, its reappearance Affettuoso (poco Andante):

Ex. 4.



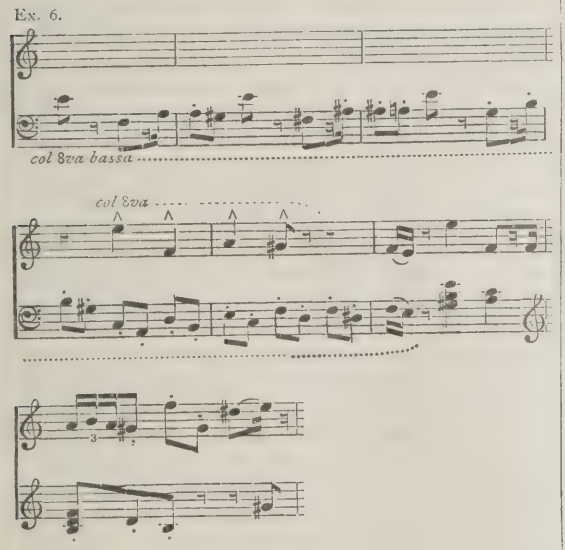
And here is a superbly significant combination of both motives:

Ex. 5.



Having noted how the second motive becomes expressive of a tender mood after its first suggesting an altogether thoughtful, introspective mood, it is instructive to observe the treatment of this same motive in the sarcastic, Mephistophelian vein of the final section. The quotation gives an instance of working out as well as mere transformation—and from this particular point of view, the whole Finale teems with interest:

Ex. 6.



Of the second section, 'Gretchen,' Mr. Ernest Newman has said ('Musical Studies,' p. 93):

> This section is surpassingly beautiful throughout. In face of this divine piece of music alone the present neglect of Liszt's work in England is something inexplicable.

On the other hand, Edward Dannreuther ('Oxford History of Music,' vol. vi., p. 149) says that:

> The Gretchen themes are delicate and tender, the dainty illustration of 'Er liebt mich, er liebt mich nicht' is of charming naïveté, the modifications of the Faust subjects quoted or adapted from the first movement, are sufficiently eloquent. Yet the section, taken as a whole, produces an incongruous effect.

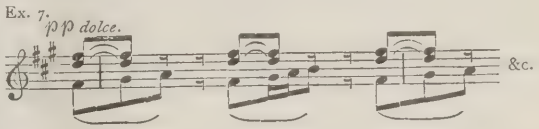
It may be as well to recall the fact that this writer, with a wisdom and sense of fairness all too rare in musical criticism, writes in his preface:

> A book so closely in touch with the actualities of present day musical life . . . can hardly avoid the expression of disputable criticisms. These must be understood to represent merely the personal opinions of the writer.

I quote his view and that of Mr. Newman side by side in order once again to show how far we are from having reached with regard to Liszt's music the same practically satisfactory adjustment that we have attained regarding the music of the other great masters of his time.

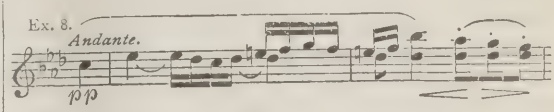
The illustration of 'Er liebt mich, er liebt mich nicht' to which Dannreuther refers is a bone of contention par excellence among writers on programme-music. It has often been alleged that it is unintelligible except by reference to the programme. Here is the passage in question:

Ex. 7.



Now can anybody fail to realise its intimate musical relation with the introductory bars of the section:

Ex. 8.



of which it is a formally logical outcome?

Broadly speaking, the full significance of the final movement depends upon one's recollection of the former movements. This, musically speaking, is only as it should be. There are, I believe, few music-lovers who would care to maintain that the same is not equally true of a Mozart or a Beethoven symphony as well as of Franck's 'Cyclic' Symphony. But to realise the significance of the motives in their new, distorted forms (see above, Ex. 6), you need not conceive them as distortions. Even without reference to their previous aspects, they are eloquent and fully satisfactory just as they stand. So that here, again, it is impossible to allege that Liszt's music cannot be accounted for except by reference to the programme. Consider it as music, purely and simply, if you wish to realise its true spirit—for Liszt was, indeed, as Wagner has said, 'the most musicianly of musicians'; and his many errors never included that of writing 'literary' music, or music intended to be conceived as a logogriph. It is quite rightly that Cecil Gray, in his 'Survey of Contemporary Music,' points out that Strauss's conception of programme-music is the very reverse of Liszt's. No better proof could be found than this 'Faust' Symphony, the altogether admirable work of which, alas! I have barely touched the fringe, despite my desire to describe its beauty.

Ad Libitum

By 'Feste'

Preaching to the converted is mere waste of time. I have received so many letters saying 'Hear, hear!' to my article of last month, that there seems little point in carrying out my promise to back it up with illustrations. Moreover, I find that the best—or worst—of these examples call for a prohibitive amount of space and music-type. I propose, therefore, to shift my ground somewhat, and deal with one or two aspects of the question that were not fully discussed.

But first I may be allowed to say a few words in reply to Mr. Gwynn Williams's letter, which appears on another page. In quoting last month some recently published music I purposely refrained from mentioning the composers' names, because I wished the discussion to be as impersonal as possible. As the works were hot from the press—if one may use so generous a term in connection with music which was not even lukewarm—and were not of a type that would take the market by storm, I felt that there was little risk of treading on anybody's toes. Apparently my softheartedness was in vain. Mr. Gwynn Williams's plea that his 'Dance of the Two Fairies' was intended for children makes his case the worse. Surely, if there is one department of music in which the models, however simple, should be of the very best, it is that for the use of the young. Is a piece in which the part-writing consists entirely of fifths a good model? Is it even useful on the technical side? A child able to play these fifths cleanly and at the right speed would be more profitably employed in real part-writing, with the hands engaged in different time-values, and oblique or contrary motion. To play in consecutive fifths is really no more difficult than playing in octaves, one part to each hand.

However, there is no need to dwell on this matter. The 'Dance' was quoted as a particularly striking example of the length to which our consecutive fifth enthusiasts are ready to go—a length which absolves them from any responsibilities in the way of skill or labour. Readers have seen the sample I quoted; they may read elsewhere in this issue what the composer has to say on its behalf, and they may take their choice. For my part, rather than start youngsters on such uninteresting fare, I would draw on the despised Sonatinas of Clementi, wherein I should be sure of their finding material that would begin to pave their way to the classics, just as the elementary reading-book that tells them the cat is on the mat and Ned is a sad lad puts their young feet on the road to the finest literature. If, however, it led off by saying that the tac is on the tam and that Den is a das dal it would not only be useless; it would be dull and uninteresting as well. Nevertheless it would have almost as much relation to literature as a piece entirely in fifths would bear to music.

A note on the other question raised by Mr. Gwynn Williams: If, like many musicians this side of Offa's Dyke, I have got an impression that the aims of the Welsh Nationalist party tend to self-isolation, the blame lies at the door of some of the Nationalists themselves. Their public utterances are usually in the form of a diatribe against 'flat-footed Teutonism' or 'feeble Anglicanism,' with a plea for Welsh composers—not because they are great but because they are Welsh. I recall, amongst other signs, an account of the Welsh National Eisteddfod, written by one of the Nationalist leaders, Mr. Leigh Henry, in which a large proportion of the space was given up to a personal attack on Sir Walford Davies, on no better grounds, apparently, than that Sir Walford is doing his best to enlarge the Welsh outlook. (By the way, this report was something of a journalistic feat, inasmuch as it set out to tell the reader about the National Eisteddfod, and ended by doing little more than let us know that the writer couldn't stand Sir Walford Davies's conducting, speaking, or anything else. Not a single result of any competition was given—and after all, readers do like to know the winners of the chief events.) Mr. Gwynn Williams may be surprised to hear that I do my best to keep myself informed of the aims of the Welsh Nationalists by reading the English portions of Y Cerddor Newydd, edited by himself, and I struggle regularly with the long articles contributed by Mr. Leigh Henry to the Western Daily Mail, though it is true that the latter is largely made up of reiterations of Mr. Henry's discovery that Brahms was a flat-footed pedant, and Victorian music a foul thing and to be avoided. What Wales needs, in order to make the most of the rich possibilities of her temperament, is to become a good bit less Welsh for a generation or so. When she has made up her lee-way in regard to knowledge of great music generally, and especially orchestral and chamber music, her composers will get busy, and will turn out something worth the attention of musicians over the border. At present, is there one Welsh composer of importance who has not learned his craft in England or elsewhere outside the Principality, and so become more or less of a cosmopolitan? Mr. Williams says that the need now is for Welsh composers to be given opportunities for developing their art. There can be no better opportunities than those which Sir Walford Davies and his staff are trying to bring to Wales, despite the opposition of the Nationalists. Some day they may see that he is really a truer Nationalist than the Leigh Henrys who yap at his heels. National characteristics should be preserved, but without fertilisation from outside they will produce little. Mr. Williams quotes the early German school. Very well; I suppose he will agree that Bach was German music personified. Yet Bach went to Italy for a great deal of his string idiom (which in its turn influenced his writing for other media—even the organ), and we know what he owed to the early French claveçin school. In fact, he took in all the good music he could find, from whatever part of Europe it came. 'Let's go and hear the pretty little tunes,' he said to one of his youngsters, and took him off to the Italian opera of the day. And with all the music-writing he had to do in connection with his own works, he yet found time to make copies of things from outside that pleased him. All these external influences helped him to be the composer he was, without making him any the less a German. And I'll bet, anyway, the old chap never thought about developing a 'German school.' His job was merely to write as well as he could, aided by the best models, no matter from what country they came. Hence the German school, the result of so little conscious effort towards nationalism that we might almost call it a mere by-product. And that's how the Welsh school will come in due season.

Last month I suggested that one of the faults of modern music was its excessive difficulty. There is a practical point here that seems to be generally overlooked. It is a well-known fact that there is a very strong connection between the amateur performer and concerts of the solo recital type. Thus, the audience at (say) a pianoforte recital is very largely made up of pianists, mostly amateur. And it is also a familiar fact that a pianoforte recitalist who wants to make sure of a full hall must play a good proportion of familiar Beethoven, Chopin, Schumann, &c. I have not the least doubt that if you canvassed the audience at an average recital you would find the majority were in the habit of playing or teaching a good proportion of the pieces in the programme, and that they had come to hear them partly for enjoyment, and partly to pick up tips, or to compare the player's reading with that of other pianists. Now, technically the bulk of this music is within the powers of the average well-taught amateur. In fact, if you look down the classical catalogue you will be astonished at the amount of music that is both fine and only moderately difficult—some acknowledged masterpieces may almost be described as easy. Very well. The question is, What are these thousands of more or less well-equipped amateur players to do if they want to become as familiar with contemporary music as they are with classical? How many sonatas or other important works for pianoforte by present-day composers can be tackled by the amateur who is able to make a creditable show with all but the knottiest of Beethoven, for example? It is hardly an exaggeration to say that such a player, looking round for contemporary music to add to his repertory, would find on one side a stack of pieces for children, and on the other a pile of music making demands, both mental and technical, hopelessly beyond him. Even a short piece of a few pages in the latter class will probably contain in a concentrated form as much difficulty as would be found in many a big classical work. This is a most unfortunate state of things, and points to short sight on the part of both composers and publishers. Why should not our Irelands and Baxes, Schmitts and Ravels, Kodálys and Bartóks, write pieces that are as negotiable as the hundreds of fine classical pianoforte works that are played in the domestic circle? In other words (since even composers must eat, drink, and be clothed), why not sell ten thousand copies instead of ten hundred? Why leave all the big sales to the classics, on the one hand, and the 'tripe,' vocal and instrumental, on the other?

A reader says, 'Oh! but a composer must write as he feels.' Musical history doesn't bear the reader out, for it is certain that many fine works have been written to order, or in competition. I have no doubt that if a publisher approached a composer with a sufficiently tempting offer for a pianoforte sonata calculated to sell even half as well as any one of the first twenty Sonatas of Beethoven, the composer would somehow contrive to 'feel' like rising to the occasion. During the past few years I have listened to the first performances of a fair number of big modern pianoforte works, and on several occasions I followed the music, copy in hand. Time after time I found myself noting passages in which the almost grotesque technical demands could have been halved, with no loss of effect—sometimes with actual gain. It seems as if composers imagine there is some merit in saying what they have to say in as difficult—sometimes merely awkward—a form as possible. It is all a part of the wrongheadedness that leads them to write songs in which almost all the interest is in the accompaniment; and choral music wherein the singers spend most of their effort in hitting on the mere notes, or the various voices are kept hard at work in the least effective parts of their compass. Any competition festival judge, and many a choral competitor, will bear me out when I say that a large proportion of part-music of the up-to-date type simply doesn't 'come off' in performance. It looks well on paper, and it sounds well on the pianoforte—in fact, much of it seems to have been painfully evolved at the keyboard. Now, we are always being warned not to judge madrigals and other examples of pure choral music by playing them over, and the advice is so sound that we may almost deduce a rule, viz., that good vocal part-writing doesn't sound well on the pianoforte, whereas bad vocal part-writing does. The 'advanced' modern composer will rarely write good music of this kind till he can overcome his chromatic and dissonant obsession, and think in lines rather than blobs of colour.

I imagine that the case of the ultra-modern school has not been better put than by Mr. Rollo Myers in his little book, 'Modern Music' (Kegan Paul, 2*s.* 6*d.*). Yet despite Mr. Myers's lucidity and fairness, a second careful perusal leaves me convinced that certain features of the 'advanced' school will be as barren as the whole-tone scale. What a fuss was made over that! For a time every composer who didn't wish to appear too far behind the van of progress dragged the scale in; but never, surely, was a piece of musical material so soon exhausted. Of course its weaknesses ought to have been apparent from the first; the fact of all its intervals being whole-tones made for monotony both in melody and harmony. It has no future, except in the hands of the organ-tuners, with whom it had had a useful career long before composers discovered it. (Every organist reader will recall many an occasion—generally on a Saturday morning—when his entry into church has been greeted with the sound of the whole-tone scale, with halts, and wails, and wrestlings, and cries from the tuner: 'Next; next; back one; BACK one, d'ye hear! next; right. Now the other side.' And so on. In fact, to many of us the scale does little more than recall these visits of the tuner and his long-suffering boy.)

I see little more of a future for atonality and polytonality than for the whole-tone scale, and, so far as atonality is concerned, for the same reason—it leads to monotony. 'A-tonality,' Mr. Myers tells us, 'is the abandonment of any recognisable key,' and, in order to whet our appetite for it, he gives us this extract from Schönberg's 'Sechs Kleine Klavierstücke':

(I quote the shortest and simplest of the examples.)

You may object to this on various grounds, but my chief complaint is that after a few bars it would become deadly monotonous. Consider how much the variety and interest of music depend upon modulation, the contrast and opposition of different keys, of major and minor, and even of the now-revived ancient modes; add to it the importance, so far as construction is concerned, of a good key scheme, and the dependence of melody and rhythm on the harmonic structure. All these things make for life, variety, interest. What is atonality able to give us in either respect?

As for polytonality: this seems to be either (a) largely a matter of notation, or (b) so dissonant as to be not worth considering. Mr. Myers quotes the following from a Bagatelle by Béla Bartók:

Ex. 2.

He calls it 'interesting and beautiful.' Interest and beauty are so much matters of taste that we can't argue about them, but it seems to me that the piece has little significance apart from the fact of its being noted in two keys. If the signature in both staves were four flats, the result would be nothing much more than the simultaneous use of major and minor thirds (F♭ and F♮, &c.)—an effect which has long since been familiar, though not exactly in this shape. Still, it must be admitted that the Bagatelle opens up possibilities of various melodic strands in different keys played by instruments carefully chosen for their tone-colour. But such effects would soon pall, and for practical purposes would be of little more use to a composer than any of the existing supply of discords.

Mr. Myers's other examples are less happy. This, from a Fox-Trot by Auric:

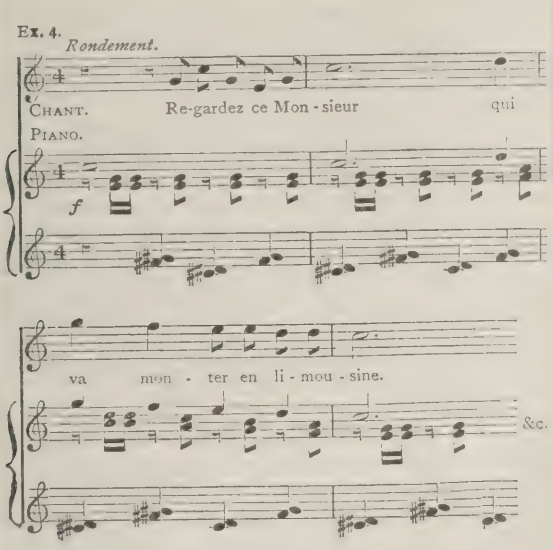
is certainly polytonal, but is it of the slightest musical value? And even so, some of it might have been noted in such a way as to destroy the poly. For example, the last bar, which on paper gives us three keys, might be regarded as a 13th in B♭ minor, with F♯ as G♭, the minor 9th. And, in the second half of the bar, we might change the D♭ into C♯, and regard the result as simultaneous major and minor 13ths on A, with a minor 9th. But regard it how you like, it is a poor effort.

Mr. Myers draws on another of the young Paris bloods for this third example:

Ex. 4.



It is from Milhaud's 'Monsieur Protopopoff,' and being a humorous effort, need not be regarded too seriously. Mr. Myers calls it 'a good example of polytonality,' but to most of us it is merely a bald commonplace in C, with some irrelevant clusters of notes stuck on. If this is polytonality, what are the keys used beside C major? They might be E, B, C sharp, F sharp, and, if noted in flats, we have a further choice. But, again, what is the musical value of such a passage? Here it has a certain impudent flavour that is not unfunny, but the ultra-modern cause must be in a bad way if such japes are to be drawn on as examples of 'progress.' Mr. Myers might have found much more interesting and significant illustrations of polytonality in some of the short pianoforte pieces of Eugène Goossens. But so far I have seen nothing in the polytonal line that seems to suggest anything beyond more or less clever 'stunting.'

Bound up with these questions of polytonality and atonality is what Mr. Myers calls 'an extreme form of polyphony (contrapuntal independence) pushed to its logical conclusion.' This is the foundation of Schönberg's system:

> . . . the doctrine of complete independence for each voice, which he pushes to extreme limits, naturally results in the abolition of tonality, and thence (in some cases) to cacophony.

This, of course, is merely a development along lines as old as Bach, or even older. The only question is, how far may a composer go without producing effects that the human ear can neither understand nor tolerate? Polyphony may be so extreme, and the independence of the constituent parts pushed so far, that the result may not be 'logical,' but the reverse. A polyphonic discussion, like a verbal argument, may be carried beyond reasonable limits, and become a reductio ad absurdum.

Mr. Myers thus explains the different outlook of the old and new polyphonic composers:

> Whereas the problem for the old contrapuntalists was how to combine two or more 'voices' within one embracing parent harmony, so to speak, while allowing to each as great a degree of independence and melodic interest as possible, the tendency of the modern contrapuntal school is to concentrate first upon the melodic line or lines, and then to find, if possible, a harmonic formula into which the various parts may be somehow squeezed.

These problems don't seem very dissimilar, after all. But a good deal depends upon that 'if possible.' If the modern composer can't hit on a harmonic formula into which the parts may be 'somehow squeezed,' what does he do? Presumably in such cases, he goes on, as Mr. Myers admits, to cacophony. This strikes me as a poor sort of 'progress.' Surely there was a kind of beauty in the skill with which the old contrapuntists combined widely dissimilar parts within one parent harmony. That was their problem, and to its solution we owe some of the finest pages in all music, from the tremendous opening chorus of the 'St. Matthew' Passion to the 'Meistersinger' Overture. But Bach and Wagner did not work on the policy of combining themes harmoniously 'if possible,' cacophonously if otherwise. If a combination of themes couldn't be made to 'go,' they gave up the idea, since they were out to write music, not to perplex or outrage the ear. The modern composer who makes his themes go together, willy nilly, may claim that he is 'progressing'; but he is more likely to be shirking a difficulty. Mr. Myers goes on:

> It is probable that if our ears could ever be trained to follow each 'voice' separately—and Schönberg's music, for example, really pre-supposes this possession of this faculty—much that at present sounds obscure or even cacophonous would then appear harmonious and clear.

Much virtue in your 'if'! A composer may 'pre-suppose' the development of this faculty to any extent he pleases, but the fact remains that the limits of the normal musical ear, so far as polyphonic perception is concerned, are soon reached. After all, the chief beauty in polyphony is in the collective result. What matters most is not that a number of parts are all saying different things at the same time, but that the combination gives us a harmonic richness and beauty of texture that are obtainable by no other means. Mr. Myers says that it is along the Schönbergian lines that music is progressing, and that 'our ears will somehow have to adapt themselves to the new demands which are being made upon them.' Will they? The only possible means of enabling them to do so will be to give us very frequent performances of such works as 'Pierrot Lunaire.' As, however, it calls for a prohibitive amount of rehearsal, our ears are not likely to have much chance of growing sufficiently lengthy to take in the Schönbergian cacophony. Moreover, even if the facilities were forthcoming, life isn't long enough to justify our spending time in trying to cultivate abnormal ears for abnormal music, when there is so much normal music, old and new, which we want to hear. Think of the vast amount of music by Bach, Purcell, the Tudor and Elizabethan writers, the pre-Bach Germans, Palestrina, Vittoria, and a host of others, which is either unknown, or heard only on rare occasions. All of it can be taken in by the normal ear, and I hope mine will be knocking about long enough to take in lots of it. Until I have exhausted this field, I have no time to spend on music that must be listened to with a wet towel round my head, and aural faculties slowly trained to be able to perceive a large number of parts being 'somehow squeezed' into a formula which can only by courtesy be called 'harmonic.'

One of my correspondents points out that I have said nothing about a pet cry of the modernist —'the elimination of the unessential.' What do I think of it? Well, like every other idea that has economy as its basis, all depends on our definition of 'unessential.' The theory of the modern composer is that having suggested (for example) a cadence, he needn't waste time and space by seeing it through; he leaves the listener to do the job mentally. Similarly, discords may be left in the air instead of being resolved. There is a good deal in this natural reaction against the habit of the Vienna classics of emphasising full closes and reiterating final cadences to maddening point. (The final Prestissimo of the Ninth Symphony, e.g., consists of seven bars of tonic and dominant, followed—in order that we may have no doubt about the matter—by fourteen bars of tonic chord. There may be even worse cases, but this one occurs to me first.) And of course there is nothing very new or even daring in the practice of leaving discords in the air, or deferring the resolution to a later point. But the short cut principle may easily be carried too far. Music has gradually acquired a stock of conventional matter (the word conventional is used here in no derogatory sense) corresponding to those humble little word-groups with which we link up the important expressions that carry our meaning. In themselves they are commonplace, but a writer or speaker who deliberately avoided them would be not only stilted and artificial: he may even end by becoming barely intelligible. They may be regarded as the copper coinage of language: and you won't travel easily and far without such small change. (When you want to buy a paper or a postage stamp or pay a bus fare, a penny will meet the case more expeditiously than a sovereign.) Now, music has plenty of progressions that correspond pretty much to these verbal ha'pence—the various types of cadence, half-close, sequence, &c., are not unlike such conventional locutions as 'in fact,' 'this may be so,' 'by the by,' and so forth, and a composer who has something to say needn't be afraid to employ a reasonable number of them. You will find typical examples in every great piece of music, and only when the classical composers were temporarily 'off colour' and less ready of invention than usual, do we find the conventions assuming too large a place in the scheme. I believe the fatigue we feel in listening to a lengthy modern work is largely due to the fact that the material is too continuously important, or (more likely) pretentious. The ear is kept too long on the stretch. If composers would cut out a lot of the notes and accidentals that merely cloud the issue, and drop in a few straightforward passages as mental breathing-places for the hearer, they would be eliminating the unessential in a way that would help. Present efforts direction unintelligible inevitably cause hearer excessive demands grey matter. And if I eliminated any more you wouldn't understand me at all. This analogy between music and language is not perfect, I know, but 'tis near enough to serve.

It occurs to me now that I have got away rather from the British composer, and have been concerned mainly with some Continental extremists. It doesn't matter much, as the difference is chiefly one of degree. Happily a good distance separates the best of our native composers from such abnormalities as Schönberg and the more puerile of the young French school. But they show signs that in a different way, are hardly less disquieting—mannerisms, excessive complexity and difficulty, and, above all, an apparent lack of ability to say the big simple thing that has always marked the great composer of the past. Is there one among our Englishmen who is writing fresher, better, more convincing music than he did ten years ago? The very fact that such a question is being constantly asked is ominous, for most of them are just around the age when all the great composers who didn't die young were producing their finest work.

STUDIES ON THE HORN

By W. F. H. Blandford

III.—The Fourth Horn in the 'Choral Symphony.'

II.

It should be evident to the reader who has been at the pains to study this long preamble, especially if he turns to the complete second-horn part of Beethoven's Sextet, Op. 81*b*, or the parts of his Wind Quintet, Septet, or Horn Sonata, that the solo in the Ninth Symphony is strictly a cor-basse part. The only phrase in it that requires proof is the scale in A♭, which does not find its counterpart elsewhere in Beethoven's works.

Domnich, on pp. 54, 55 of his Method, under the heading 'Premier Cor,' and on pp. 82, 83, under 'Deuxième Cor,' gives two corresponding series of exercises on scales, rising by degrees of a semitone, the series for the cor-alto being naturally continued farther than that for the cor-basse. He prefaces them by saying

> The two following exercises, which depart from the natural gamut of the instrument, present difficulties in respect of intonation and the use of the hand in the bell. . . . It should be observed that they cannot be executed as rapidly as the preceding ones [in the key of C], and it follows that they can only produce a good effect in moderate time.

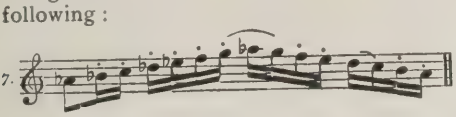
Among the scales common to both registers is the following :

Ex. 7.



These exercises therefore prove decisively that Beethoven's scale was within the course of training of the cors-basses of his day. The conjecture that he was in any way influenced by the valve-horn is as foolish as it is without foundation. If he had contemplated writing for the valve-horn—which he was probably too deaf to appreciate, if he ever met it—we may reasonably suppose that he would have given it something to do which the natural horn could not accomplish, as did Halévy, Schumann, and Wagner. Even proof that the player used a valve-horn at the first performance would establish no stronger case against the composer than does the fact (for which, with other valuable information, we are indebted to the courtesy of Dr. Eusebius Mandyczewski, Librarian of the Gesellschaft für Musikfreunde, at Vienna) that they were used in the centenary performance last year.

It may be argued that Beethoven could have well divided the part between the fourth horn and one of the others, as is often done in modern performances. No doubt he could, but that this would have offended against his artistic canons is shown by a detail that has hitherto escaped notice. In the Philharmonic manuscript, at bar 11 of the movement, and under the second entry of the fourth horn, are the words, in the handwriting of the original copyist, 'Sempre Corn : 2do.' They are omitted from all the published scores, including the editio princeps of Schotts Söhnen, Mayence, &c. (1825). But the best printed scores are apt not to give instrumental headings and the like in the exact words of a composer.

There is no indication whatever in Beethoven's music that he under-estimated the value of the cor-basse, which had so impressed him when he heard Punto play it. His chamber music parts for it have been mentioned. Among his orchestral passages are the subject which opens the Allegro of the 'Fidelio' Overture, and must be reckoned among the ancestry of the horn motive in 'Till Eulenspiegel'—although Strauss gives the latter to the first and third horns, a step which would surely have surprised Beethoven. Another is the beautiful passage for E horn in the Allegretto of the seventh Symphony, where a cantabile effect is required in the middle register. Shorter phrases are to be found in the 'Eroica' (the familiar 'false entry') and the Rondo of the 'Emperor' Concerto. Perhaps the most interesting, having regard to the date of composition so near that of the 'Choral' Symphony, is in the Mass in D. Here, in the Allegretto ma non troppo in the Credo, which forms part of the setting to the words 'Et vitam venturi,' the second horn plays the following passages, during the silence of the first : and, what is even more remarkable, in the Sanctus the second horn in E and the third and fourth in D sustain the work while the first has a tacet throughout the movement. Can a parallel case to this, in which the first horn alone is not made use of in a movement, be produced?

Once it is admitted that the composer was merely following contemporary practice and his own artistic inclinations in giving this solo to a cor-basse, so that the choice of executant rested between the second and fourth horn, the 'fourth-horn problem' loses much of the importance it has assumed through being scanned through modern glasses.

The practice of employing four horns in the orchestra may be said to date from Cherubini's 'Lodoiska' (1791), for the isolated examples to be found in the works of Handel, Haydn, and Mozart cannot have gone far to establish it. Sometimes the four were placed in the same key; the better practice, as is generally known, was to write for two pairs in different keys, so that each supplemented the other's deficiencies. Other exceptional modes of distribution may be disregarded.

When the pairs were in different keys, the commonest method was to place the first pair in the tonic key of the movement (in minor modes, the tonic or relative major) and the second pair in a more remote key, usually that of the principal modulation. This is familiar knowledge that can be verified in any collection of scores of a century or more ago.

Beethoven's scores form no exception. Taking the movements in which his pairs are placed in different keys, the number in which the first pair is in the tonic, or relative major, exceeds the number in which it is not so placed by about three to one ; and the converse, when met with, can sometimes be accounted for by special circumstances. Thus, in the quartet accompaniment to the bass aria, 'Will unser Genius,' in 'The Ruins of Athens,' the second pair is in C, the tonic, to form the foundation of the harmony, and the first pair is in F, because the C-horn would be unmanageable for these parts. This arrangement was followed by Weber in the opening of 'Der Freischütz.'

If the custom of writing the first pair in the tonic were founded on a desire to subordinate the second pair on account of the presumptively less efficiency of the executants, one would expect to find evidence of this in the parts themselves. In Beethoven's scores we have failed to find such evidence. Sometimes the first pair is pitched in a high and the second in a low key; at other times the converse is the case. Either may have the longer or more strenuous parts. If examination of a few movements seems to establish a principle, some other movement is sure to upset it. We are therefore driven to the conclusion that the two pairs were regarded as of practically equal importance, either of which could be written for as the exigencies of composition required. One had to precede the other in the score, and it was natural that the pair in the tonic should stand first.

The horn parts of the 'Choral' Symphony follow the common custom, and this fact affords the simple explanation why, in an Adagio in B flat, the first and second horns are in that key and the third and fourth in E flat, although it involves assigning to the fourth horn this elaborate and important part. The note in the Philharmonic manuscript against the fourth horn part, 'Sempre Corn : 2do,' is confirmatory of the view that the pairs are to be regarded as co-equal—although it would be a mistake to attach excessive importance to the direction. For Beethoven it was not the fourth horn, but the second horn of the second pair, that he regarded as his principal.

It is unfortunate that his works afford no other symphonic material for comparison. His remaining parts for four horns are to be found in overtures and dramatic and vocal works, the scope of which offers little opportunity for differential treatment of the two pairs. For some reason that is difficult to fathom, the use of four horns in the symphonic, lagged behind their use in the dramatic orchestra. When in 1815 Cherubini presented the Philharmonic Society with an overture and a symphony, both of which were performed the same year, the former was scored for four horns and the latter for two only.

When a musician of the front rank composes a score—whether it be the Mass in B minor, the 'Choral' Symphony, or the 'Ring der Nibelungen'—that is in advance of its time and destined for performances involving special resources and preparation, there is no valid reason why he should assume and allow for technical incompetence on the part of any executant. Provided that his parts do not transcend the limits of human endeavour, he has the right to expect due provision to be made for securing competent performers, and is not called on to provide against failure in this respect. Has it ever been suggested that Wagner expected that his parts for horns five to eight in the 'Ring' were to be taken by players inferior to the other four? Probably not; and it is not necessary to credit Beethoven with a similar belief about his fourth horn.

It would be of service to know when four horns came into general use as permanent components of good orchestras—but any dates are most difficult to ascertain. The presence of four names in an old programme—and they are scarce enough—does not indicate whether or not the third and fourth players were specially engaged for the occasion. If they were, they might be of any degree of competence that the parts called for, provided that an adequate supply of players existed on which to draw. One cannot even, without confirmatory evidence, infer the existence of four horns from the fact of a programme including works that required that number. The orchestra list of the Edinburgh Festival of 1824 contains the names of two only, the brothers Petrides*; nevertheless the Overture to 'Der Freischütz' was performed at the second concert. Could the introduction have been transcribed as a duet? Hardly, on hand-horns.

A collation of the names given in Ledebur† and Köchel‡ discloses, subject to the completeness of the information there given, that the Royal Orchestra at Berlin did not possess three horns until 1815, or four until 1817. The Imperial Court Orchestra at Vienna possessed three in 1808; but down to 1867 no four names given by Köchel overlap. Such lists afford no great help unless one can take account of the conditions of full membership and the employment of supernumeraries. The Paris Opera House is as likely as any to have early admitted four horns to permanent membership of the band, but it has not been possible to ascertain the date. There is no reason for supposing that the King's Theatre employed more than two, except as supernumeraries, before the departure of the Petrides.

In 1817 Beethoven wrote to Ries, then in London, to ask the strength of the Philharmonic Society's orchestra—'Have you one or two sets of wind instruments?' being one of his questions.* Ries's reply is not recorded. Probably he said that four horns were procurable; but he is unlikely, judging from what can be gathered about the Society's early concerts, to have given such information as would lead Beethoven to compose five or six years later with any special London horn-player in view. But the question itself proves that the presence of four horns was not to be assumed without inquiry.

When a third and fourth horn were first permanently attached to orchestras, probably theatrical, they may have played other instruments when their services on the horn were not called for. It was customary for the hornist to learn some second instrument so that loss of teeth or other mishap should not deprive him of a livelihood.† Punto was a violinist, and acted as leader in the Théâtre des Variétés Amusans in Paris during the Revolution. In this capacity he esteemed himself more than others did; for, when he appeared as leader at Vienna, 'it was wished for his credit that he had never done so.'

The idea that the fourth horn is 'usually the inferior of the other three' must have arisen since it became customary to place four players on a permanent footing, and since the introduction of the valve-horn put them all on an equality and abolished the alternate use of two pairs of instruments in different keys. The disappearance of the distinction between cor-alto and cor-basse, and the uniform method of training now adopted, have diminished the importance of the lower register, and the merits of the modern artist are gauged by his capacity to command the entire compass of the instrument. Nevertheless, in an orchestra not composed of a leaven of a few fine players in a host of incapables, there should be no ground for regarding the fourth horn as inferior to the others. If he can play his parts with real efficiency (and they require a special aptitude) there is no more justification for regarding him as inferior to his colleagues than for regarding the bass trombone as 'the inferior of' the two tenor trombones.

The modern plan of concentrating all important passages, high or low, in the first-horn part (with occasional relief by the third) has the disadvantages that attend all developments of the 'star system.' The first horn becomes a sort of high-priest, with attendant acolytes. He is overworked, all-round efficiency is not stimulated, and it is not surprising if the second and fourth horns, fallen from the high estate of the old cor-basse and having often little to do except filling up harmonies and admiring the evolutions of their companions, are liable to an access of bashfulness when called on to lift up their unsheltered voices in song.

If it were certain that Beethoven wrote this part for a particular player, as Grove suggests, the problem would assume a different aspect. There is no evidence that he did, but the impossibility of proving a negative precludes any positive assertion that he did not. In our opinion, he did not so intend it, and we shall examine what evidence there is that leads to a presumption for or against.

Supposing that it could be established that Beethoven composed the Adagio at a time when his ideas were concentrated on his commission for the Philharmonic Society, it would be safe to assume that he had no special executant in his mind. But when an attempt is made to fix the date of composition from the available data, one is confronted with one of those mysteries with which musical research teems. The subject is too long and involved for full discussion here, but one point of interest and importance may be referred to.

On September 5, 1823, Beethoven wrote to Ries in London:

> The copyist to-day at last finished the score of the Symphony. . . . The copy will shortly be sent off . . . it is too bulky to forward by express.*

On the face of it, this letter would appear conclusively to fix the date of the composition; nevertheless, it has not been generally accepted as so doing. Grove observes that it must refer to some preliminary draft, or at any rate can refer only to the earliest movements,† and adduces three reasons, one of which is a statement by a writer in The Harmonicon for January, 1824, who, describing a visit to the composer on September 28, 1823, said that Beethoven was desirous of ascertaining for a particular composition he was then about, the highest note of the trombone. The inquiry might well have related to a finished composition the score of which had never left the composer's possession.

It so happens that the trombone parts, with the exception of those in the Andante maestoso, are not contained in the body of the Philharmonic manuscript, but are relegated to a separate appendix. The note at the beginning of the Presto, where 'the bass trombone wakes up from its long sleep,' is cued into the score by the copyist, but it is not the highest note on the instrument, nor in the Symphony.

It is curious that the parts should be present in the Andante maestoso and not in the succeeding Allegro energico; this might be accounted for by the desire not to overcrowd the score by introducing two more staves. But the same reasoning does not explain their absence in the Molto vivace, where there is ample room. Further, the prospectus recently issued by Messrs. Kistner & Siegel, of Leipsic, of the proposed photographic facsimile of Beethoven's autograph score, contains a reproduction of two pages, readily identifiable as bars 35 to 48 of the last choral movement—Prestissimo. There are no trombone parts in the autograph.

This strengthens the presumption that some of the movements which contain trombone parts may have been composed before September 28, 1823; because, the decision to employ trombones having been once taken, the natural course would have been to incorporate parts for them in so much of the score as remained to be put on paper and in which trombones were required.

The Berlin fair copy has these parts written in the Molto vivace; but we have no information as to the choral movements.

Relying on the 'sketch-books,' Nottebohm* states that the Symphony was composed in sketch form during the autumn of 1823, and completed by the end of that year or the beginning of 1824, and that it was written out in score from the sketches by the end of February, 1824. These dates are accepted by Thayer, or rather his continuators. It will be apparent that this chronology conflicts with the facts stated about the trombone parts. But here the matter must be left for the present.

Even on Nottebohm's dates, it may still be accepted that the Adagio was complete before the idea of a Viennese performance had taken shape in the composer's mind. It could not be speedily modified to accommodate the wishes of a special player, because the fourth-horn part is built into the structure of the movement, not merely as regards the solo quoted, but for a further twenty-eight bars, during which there is never a complete bar's rest. It remains in the foreground of the orchestral picture and, if of less executive difficulty than the first fourteen bars, is liable to become extremely fatiguing before the end is reached.

It was not until February, 1824, that a proposal to perform the Symphony at Vienna was made to Beethoven by a 'round-robin' of music-lovers. In spite of his first refusals and the delay caused by the difficulty of settling on a suitable concert-hall, the first performance took place on May 7, 1824. This would allow just enough time to prepare and correct orchestra and chorus parts from the one or two fair copies in existence.

One would like to know beyond doubt the name of the fourth-horn player at the first performance. Dr. Mandyczewski, however, states that not only are the names of the original horn players unknown, but even the precise composition of the orchestra is uncertain, some saying that there were twenty and others twenty-four violins; so that the centenary performance at Vienna represented no more than an approximation to the original. A few of the original players are known — Umlauf, the conductor, Schuppanzigh, the first violin, Mayseder, Boehm, Jansa, Linke, and Conradin Kreutzer, who 'presided at the pianoforte.'†

Oral tradition, how widely spread or accepted is doubtful, appears to have coupled this part with the name of Lewy.‡

It is to this tradition that Hofmann refers in his statement about 'Levi, a fourth-horn player at Vienna,' a way of putting it that shows that he did not appreciate the point of what he wrote. Lewy was a very distinguished artist, and nearly as far from being habitually a fourth-horn player as Nanki-Poo was from being a second trombone. But if the statement is amended to read, 'Lewy, the fourth-horn player at the first performance at Vienna, &c.,' we get at something that is plausible enough to call for further consideration, even though, as Dr. Mandyczewski rightly points out, rumour is apt to be untrustworthy.*

Eduard Lewy was persuaded by Conradin Kreutzer, an admirer of his talent, to come to Vienna in 1822. Now Kreutzer held in various years the post of musical director of the Kärnthnerthor Theatre and, according to Riemann, was there in 1822-25. The troublesome negotiations in connection with the venue of the 'Akademie' of May 7, 1824, have often been told. They ended in the decision to hold the performance at the Kärnthnerthor Theatre, and Schuppanzigh in particular was commissioned to collect a special orchestra worthy of the occasion. It violates no probability to suppose that he consulted the musical director of the theatre on the composition of the band, which probably included many of the Theatre band, or that the director, Kreutzer, recommended the engagement of Lewy, his own importation, as one of the horn players. It is immaterial whether he was specially engaged on account of this part or not. His position might have given him the right of choice, or he might even have been a sub-contractor, undertaking to come and bring three other competent players with him. It would take him little time to decide which was the most important part, and, if he executed it, the solo was played for the first time, not by one who was inferior to the other three, but by one of the finest players of the day, at Vienna or elsewhere. Whether Lewy was a cor-basse or not does not seem to be recorded ; seeing that he was a soloist, and who his master was, it is not unlikely.

If it could be proved that Lewy was the original player—it is no more than a presumption—it may be asked whether that does not go to show that Beethoven wrote the part for him or at his request? That is improbable. It involves the supposition that Beethoven, in poor health, practically stone-deaf, full of worries, financial, legal, and otherwise, for some years previously out of touch with orchestras and orchestral players other than his personal friends, should have so far interested himself in a new-comer to Vienna, and a talent that it was probably out of his power to appreciate, as to write a special part for him. It would be more reasonable to suggest that the contrabass recitatives were written specially for Dragonetti, who for years had enjoyed a European reputation, and had played under Beethoven.

Schindler informs us—though not of his personal knowledge, for he was a child at the time—that Beethoven in his earlier days learnt the mechanism of instruments from various eminent players, that of the horn from Punto, and used to consult them on his compositions, reluctantly deferring to their opinions when they advised him to alter a passage—a statement that is in effect confirmed by the writer in The Harmonicon to whom we have referred. It is, therefore, possible that he submitted this solo to an expert, who may or may not have been Lewy, and that this led to its performance by the expert who passed it. But this is not the same thing as composing it specially for him.

Following Schindler, it is customary for biographers to say that Beethoven learned what he knew of writing for the horn from Punto. If the ascriptions of the posthumously published Rondino, the Quintet for pianoforte and wind, and the Sextet for strings and horns to dates prior to 1799 (when Punto first visited Vienna) are correct, this cannot have been the case, for these works show a complete mastery of the technical side of the instrument, even though the artistic use of it is less mature than in Beethoven's later works. Actually, as Thayer states, he founded his knowledge of the horn on the teaching of Nicolas Simrock, from 1773 'Court Hornist on the Electoral Toxal, in the cabinet and at table' at Cologne,* and afterwards better known as the music publisher, and in sending him his Sextet for publication in 1810, Beethoven wrote, 'The pupil has given his master many a hard nut to crack.' †

To sum up, we have endeavoured to show, on such evidence as is accessible, that Beethoven composed this fourth-horn part in strict conformity with the principles of writing for the natural (sc. the hand) horn ; that it was intended for that instrument ; that contemporary practice caused it to be assigned to a cor-basse, that is, a second- or fourth-horn player ; that the choice of the fourth as soloist was governed by the key of the movement ; that there are no adequate grounds for supposing that it was written to oblige a particular artist, but that it may have been submitted to the judgment of an expert ; and that, if tradition may be trusted, it was played by a first-rate soloist, E. C. Lewy, at the original performance—in which case the fourth horn was good because the part was difficult, and not, as Grove and perhaps Stanford seem to imply, that it was difficult because he was good. How far the proofs are adequate must be left to the reader's judgment.

The basic problem of this Adagio, so far as it touches the subject-matter, does not lie in the questions that have been discussed, but in the deeper one of how Beethoven came so to develop his conception of the orchestral treatment of the horn as to write for the fourth horn a part that has no parallel in his other works. Up to the Ninth Symphony his treatment of the horns does not differ fundamentally from that of Haydn or Mozart, except in the use of closed notes in prominent passages. When the instrument is brought in front of the general orchestral plane, it is either to deliver short isolated phrases, to which its voice is required to add a special prominence, or one of those subjects that have been always the special property of the instrument used in pairs or groups, such as the trios of the 'Eroica' and the Eighth Symphonies, or the accompaniments to 'Komm Hoffnung,' or 'Will unser Genius.' Here, however, the horn tone is interwoven throughout the texture of the movement, except the Andante sections, and the instrument figures as one of the protagonists of the moving orchestral drama. But this problem who shall answer?

* A century is easily bridged over, and it may not be irrelevant to mention that the present writer, in common with many persons now living, was personally acquainted with a violinist who took part in the second performance in England of the Symphony, and almost certainly in the first. This was John Ella (1802-88). Almost blind and deaf in his old age, his memory and intelligence were unimpaired.

* A. W. Thayer, 'The Life of Beethoven,' London, 1921, i. 24.

† The article 'Horn' in Grove's 'Dictionary of Music' speaks of this work as being 'so difficult as to be never played.' It could be played to-day as often as the public demanded it ; but Stone's article, good as it was, was out-of-date almost by the time it appeared, and should have been re-written for the second edition.

It is with good reason that Weingartner observes :

> The treatment of the orchestra in this movement is so wonderful, and the use of the horns, which is not generally Beethoven's strongest point, so magnificent, that I almost shrink from adding anything whatever to the notation. *

although one need not implicitly accept his views.

In considering the æsthetic effect of this movement it should be noted that the most important part of the fourth-horn solo is written with a multiplicity of stopped notes, to the colour of which the open notes must be subordinated. This gave it a timbre in performance that is now missing, but which was essential to the full effect. To establish this, two appreciations are quoted. The first is that of the critic who reviewed the second German performance of the Symphony at Aix-la-Chapelle (May 23, 1825).

He observes :

> The Adagio appears to me, at least in its first half, [it was not played through !] to represent a severance between the two groups of instruments, whereby the wind instruments breathe out a heavy sorrow, and the horn in particular sounds a deeply melancholy appeal, so that everything appears to combine in uttering a silently-weeping lament.†

The other is from Deldevez :

> This variation is in the subdominant of the principal key. Simple enough in melody, although not in harmony, it seems to have been the object of the boldest experiments on the composer's part. As regards executive difficulties, Beethoven may be said to have attempted to reach to the very limits of the possible. The sombre colouring, the closed notes of the horn, the flats that abound in every part, succeed admirably in producing that masterly and deliberately-planned obscurity in which the picture is shrouded, in order to give the third and last variation the brightest and most melodious contrast possible.‡

It has been said—and by a horn-player of the last generation :

> It seems absurd to say that Beethoven or any composer wrote passages of hand notes for effect ; when certain notes were written, the only way that they could be produced was by closing the bell with the hand, therefore nothing else could be done.

This is a combination of platitude and bad judgment. It was always open to a composer to abstain from writing closed notes altogether, and Beethoven did so, with one or two exceptions, such as f^{11}, when the horns were used for general filling-up. In some passages, also, of stopped notes we may concede the above statement. But there remains a certain number, of which this solo is one, in which the tone-colour of the stopped horn appears as studied and intentional on the part of the composer as it is in any passage from a modern score marked 'bouché,' or the like. This, according to Dr. Mandyczewski, was the opinion of Brahms, who considered that this passage should be played on the old instrument.

(To be concluded.)

* Op. cit., p. 166. The last clause refers to Weingartner's efforts, following Wagner's initiative, to put old wine into new bottles by amending Beethoven's orchestration to what it is presumed he would have written if he had had chromatic instruments at his disposal. Perhaps Beethoven does occasionally show signs of being 'pot-bound' ; but a logical extension of this principle would lead to all old music being performed with the modern orchestral glitter, to the destruction of the natural connection—between form and technical resources.

Music in the Foreign Press

THE GENUINE 'BORIS GODUNOV'

In Le Courrier Musical (December 1), M. Benisowitch writes :

> Attempts are now being made to revert to the real 'Boris Godunov.' The original version, re-scored from the only accessible source (viz., the original vocal score), by a Lettish composer, M. Meligailis, was produced at Riga. Excerpts, scored by Eugène Goossens, were recently performed in England. Nowadays all best qualified judges agree in considering that this masterpiece should no longer be produced in the altered form devised in order to conciliate the public of fifty years ago. The custodians of Moussorgsky's genuine autograph score should realise their responsibility and undertake (with or without aid from abroad) the task of publishing this score.

MOROCCAN MUSIC

In the same issue and the following is an interesting article on Moroccan music, with many musical examples, by M. Mény de Marangue.

MOZART'S SYMPHONY IN D (K. 506)

In Die Musik (December), F. X. Pauer calls attention to this Symphony, analyses it, and compares its materials with those of other works by Mozart. He also compares certain motives with motives that occur in works by Gluck and Beethoven. His conclusion is :

> This Symphony is a valuable and, indeed, indispensable complement to Mozart's last three instrumental masterpieces. It stands in most effective contrast with the riotous E flat major Symphony, the elegiac G minor, and the powerful, solemn 'Jupiter.' Despite Reinecke and Mottl's exertions, it has not yet quite come to its own.

A REDISCOVERED BEETHOVEN MANUSCRIPT

In the December Zeitschrift für Musikwissenschaft, Wilhelm Hitzig writes :

> Thayer mentions the song written by Beethoven on the occasion of the wedding, in 1819, of Giannastasio del Rio's daughter. The manuscript was brought to England, and was lost after remaining some years in the possession of Messrs. Ewer & Co., publishers, who published it in 1858 on the occasion of the marriage of the Emperor Frederick III. with Princess Victoria of England. Thayer possessed a copy of the lost original, which has now been rediscovered. The English edition of 1858 is inaccurate ; it contains things—such as a very poor four-part chorus—not written by Beethoven, whereas parts of what Beethoven actually wrote are omitted.

SATIE AND HIS BACKERS

In the November Nouvelle Revue Musicale, Léon Vallas writes :

> If Satie has remained the ironist he used to be, he must be intensely amused just now : for he can never have taken seriously the ridiculous homages paid to him of late. Like an apprentice who mixes pigments which a painter shall use, he had been fortunate enough to discover, some forty years ago, a few startling harmonies, whose utilisation he left to Debussy because he was incapable of employing them properly. But a day came when 'The Six' decided to hail him as a master. The episode of his 'Socrate' unaccountably carried him to a pinnacle of sorts ; this clumsy, puerile, and incoherent rhapsody was taken quite in earnest by a few eager, but very Parisian persons. One critic described Satie as the pioneer of a supremely beautiful art, closely connected to that of Peri and Caccini. What do people think, outside France, of these characteristically Parisian exaggerations? It is to be hoped that they will remember that Alexandre Dumas fils once said: 'God created Parisians so that foreigners should never quite know what to think of the French.'

A FRENCH CRITIC ON STRAVINSKY

In the same issue is quoted the following judgment of Jean Marnold on Stravinsky:

He began by imitating Korsakov and Moussorgsky, went nosing around Debussy's and Ravel's music a little, and under the influence of Schönberg wrote 'Le Sacre du Printemps.' The fact that now he is reverting to a prolix and stiff pseudo-classicism shows how artificial—indeed, how altogether non-existent—his evolution is. His originality is deliberate and laborious. His melodic indigence is striking. One may admire the extreme dexterity of his art: but one can find in it very little sensitiveness, and not a sign of intelligence. It is primary art, not primitive art, which may suit the present period, but will vanish like a meteor. I write these lines for readers of ten years hence, in full confidence.

GETTING ON SWIMMINGLY

In the Revue Pleyel (November 15), Henriot tells how one day Litolff, lunching at Reyer's house at Paris, described his first meeting with Liszt:

One day [Litolff said] I was taking a walk on the banks of the Elbe. On the opposite bank I saw a man. I had never met him before, but I knew him at once from his portraits, and he likewise saw who I was. 'Liszt!' I cried, and he, looking up, shouted, 'Litolff!' There was no bridge in sight. I jumped into the water, all clothed. He did the same. We met in the middle of the river, and warmly kissed each other.

In the November Revue Musicale, André Georges devotes an essay to Roland Manuel, whose music he praises for its ingenuity and delicacy.

BERNARD ZWEERS (1854-1924)

Cæcilia (December 16) contains an obituary notice on this composer by Willem Landré.

EMANUEL CHVALÁ (1851-1924)

In Hudebni Vychova (October), Emil Hula devotes an article to this composer, born at Prague, and a pupil of Josef Fœrster and Fibich.

PETER CORNELIUS

The December 15 issue of the Neue Musik Zeitung is almost entirely devoted to Peter Cornelius on the occasion of the centenary of his birth.

YOUNG ITALIAN COMPOSERS

In Il Pianoforte (December), G. Rossi Doria writes on Labroca, Massarani, and Vittorio Rieti.

NEW PERIODICALS

At Christiania, Musik has made its appearance. The editors are Jens Arbo and Alf Due. The first issue contains articles on Palestrina research by Dr. O. M. Sandvik, on French music by Oscar Morcman, and a reproduction of Grieg's Conservatorium testimonial, with comments by Dr. Johan Bechholm.

From Warsaw arrives the first issue of Muzyka, containing articles by Szymanowski on Chopin's music and Poland's soul, by Niewiadomski on musical criticism, by Stravinsky on his latest works, and by Adam Wieniawski on Fauré.

Both are monthlies, and both deserve a hearty welcome.

A MUSICAL SHORTHAND

The Tablettes de la Schola (December) announce that Mr. H. Raymond, professor at the Lausanne Conservatoire, has invented a system of shorthand, rendering it possible to note down at high speed both melody and harmony. The inventor is to demonstrate his system at the Paris Schola Cantorum.

Sir Henry Hadow's little book is the latest addition to the 'Home University Library of Modern Knowledge'—a series that has reached well over its hundredth number before condescending to recognise music as among the things that mattered. The section devoted to literature and art has long ago included volumes on American, German, and Russian literature, Ancient Art and Ritual, the Age of Euripides, and other subjects on which the public was presumed to be yearning for knowledge. But music? . . . However, now that the compilers have at last taken one step towards making good an unaccountable hiatus, we must encourage rather than throw stones. But it may at least be permitted to point out to them that music can no more be disposed of in one book, however able, than can literature. It calls for the same sectional treatment, unless the library is content to give to the most popular of all the arts no more than a bird's-eye view. The whole unfortunate attitude of our learned bodies towards music could not be better exemplified than in the list of volumes in this series. You see almost every subject you want to understand (and a great many you don't) treated in vols. i. ('Parliament') to cxi. ('Patriotism in Literature'); and with vol. xcii. you meet with the word 'Music' for the first time.

Sir Henry had the hard task of compassing the history of music in two hundred and fifty small pages—which is pretty much like trying to get a quart into a pint pot. The job could hardly be better done than is the case here. Following is the scheme: (1) Introductory; (2) Music of the Greeks and Hebrews; (3) Mediæval Music: The Discovery of Part-writing; (4) Bach and Handel: the Development of Tonality; (5) The Viennese School: Sonata and Symphony; (6) The Romantic Movement: Extraneous Influences; (7) Wagner, Brahms, and their Contemporaries; Conclusion. Not all of us will see eye to eye with Sir Henry on some appraisements, but no matter. There are a few slips, chiefly in the bibliography, e.g., Thomas Haynes Bailey for Bayley; W. F. Pratt for W. S. (Selden); Shellock for Shedlock (The Pianoforte Sonata); F. O. Morris for R. O. Morris; and this writer's book should have had its full title 'Contrapuntal Technique in the 16th Century.' The first two words alone would give the reader a mistaken idea of its subject. Dyson's 'New Music' is included in the list of critical books, and under the historical section we see Dyson, 'Modern Music'—apparently the same book.

Dr. White covers much the same ground as Sir Henry Hadow, and does it all in a thoroughly readable manner. A few of his statements appear to have been made hastily, however. Thus we are told that 'Handel's operas are not very remarkable, and his instrumental works, apart from his organ concertos, are not important.' Much depends upon what Dr. White means by 'remarkable,' but one would have thought that operas so rich in melodic beauty would deserve a less grudging reference. And there is a mass of instrumental music which, slight and sketchy though much of it may be, is so fresh and enjoyable that it is certainly not unimportant. The 'Concerti Grossi' alone should save this side of Handel from oblivion. In discussing folk-music, Dr. White says that > . . . some writers say that a folk-song is a composite production; that is, it was composed by several people, each of whom was responsible for some part of the tune.

The statement is one that the anti-folksongites are fond of sticking up and then ridiculing. I have never yet heard anybody seriously claim that folk-song was composite in any other way than that of evolution—i.e., by the changes that inevitably occur when a tune is transmitted by ear and sung over a wide area. Dr. White has good ground for saying 'the finest folk-music is Irish'; but when he adds that the Irish tunes 'are extremely varied, and are so expressive that they can be effectively used as instrumental pieces,' he is, I think, putting the cart before the horse. There can be little doubt that the great bulk of the finest Irish folk-tunes were instrumental in origin. Their range and style point to their having been composed for harp or pipe, and played long before they were sung.

As usual we have some exaggerated statements about Beethoven. Dr. White says it was 'chance that made it natural for him to express himself in music rather than in any other art or science.' This surely credits him with an intellectual greatness that he did not possess. He was notoriously uncultured, and barely literate. Think, too, of the elementary methods of calculation he used throughout his life. A mastery of the multiplication table ought not to have been beyond a potential great scientist! And can we say seriously that 'no composer could make so effective a use of a tune'? One hates to appear to decry a giant, even by implication, but there are more uncritical things said about Beethoven than about any other great composer, and, in the long run, Beethoven himself suffers. Dr. White adds to the practical value of this excellent book by giving particulars of gramophone records, illustrations of orchestral instruments, some concise but clear descriptions of musical forms, &c. There are numerous musical illustrations, and one's only grumble in regard to the book has to do with these. They are reproduced from very poor manuscript. Surely the Press of a famous University could have raised a fount of music-type!

Miss Eva Clare is a Canadian, and discourses enthusiastically upon a feature of musical life that is familiar in Canada and the United States, and that might eventually become so here. In the first part of her book she deals briefly with music and education and the organization of studio clubs. Part 2 consists of seven specimen papers for club use. They treat of Bach; Beethoven and the sonata form; Schubert and the art song; Schumann and Romanticism; Chopin; Liszt and the symphonic poem; and Modern Music and Debussy. Part 3 contains material for club work — suggested programmes, &c.; and the final section is an exhaustive list of books for the club library. The outlook is perhaps inevitably a trifle on the sketchy side, and there are a few carelessnesses. Thus Bach's 'Capriccio on the Departure of a Well-Beloved Brother' was not 'his one attempt at programme music,' by a very long chalk; a defence of the fugue needs something far better than a quotation from de Quincey's famous rhetorical passage and Browning's 'Master Hugues of Saxe Gotha'; our famous Bach pianist is here called Harold Samuels; it is an over-statement to say that 'in the history of music no branch is of more importance or of greater fascination as a study than that of folk-songs.' Several of the suggested programmes include Preludes and Fugues from the '48,' but in no case is the Part specified. As the two in each key sometimes differ very widely in difficulty and attractiveness the point is not unimportant. On p. 46 Miss Clare asks, 'Why is Bach so little appreciated by the average person?' The question may have point on her side of the Atlantic; it has little on ours to-day, thanks be. Paradies (or Paradisi) appears on p. 57 as 'Paradis.' Is Miss Clare serious in suggesting among 'Interesting compositions by modern composers suitable for Studio Club Programmes' Stravinsky's 'Les Cinq Doigts'? The split infinitive which opens p. 55 probably doesn't matter much in these lawless days. The bibliography needs revision; there are many misspellings, e.g., Cecil Forsythe, Cecil Sharpe, E. A. Baughar, Plunkett Greene, Stewart McPherson, &c. On the whole this volume suffers from having been read side by side with those of Sir Henry Hadow and Dr. White, so perhaps it is better than it seems—especially as Prof. Granville Bantock praises it highly in a Foreword. 'Schubert's Songs Translated.' By A. H. Fox-Strangways and Steuart Wilson.

[Oxford University Press. London: Humphrey Milford, 10*s.* 6*d.*]

Mr. Fox-Strangways has raised the question of German song translations, and to such effect that it cannot drop back where it was before.

Let us admit that it has in the past mostly been lifted with very gingerly fingers. It has generally been assumed that song translations were for the ignorant and vulgar. The 'best' people have usually declared that there should be no translations. The work—work about as tricky as can be imagined—has often been done without special talent, and seems to have had in mind an audience for whom anything was good enough. The people who mattered would sing the original text, no doubt.

Who can tell the harm done to the cause of music in England by the linguistic obstacles with which the approach is strewn? We English are not very brilliant linguists as a rule, but a long tradition of pedantry and snobbishness insists that smatterings of half-a-dozen languages are to be regarded as a preliminary to the appreciation of music.

Look at the profusion of unnecessary foreign words in our books on music! Regardless of the fact that most English people cannot pronounce German, writers on Bach persist in giving the German names of the Cantatas, instead of establishing the use of English equivalents. 'The Hymn of Praise' is always 'Lobgesang' on the lips of the very 'cultured,' and these would have us say always 'Vier Ernste Gesänge' instead of 'Four Serious Songs,' because 'serious' and 'ernst' are not exact equivalents. Lately there has been an attempt to supplant the well-established 'Forty-eight' by 'Wohltemperirte Klavier.' The worst of having spent a few years of one's youth at Leipsic is that English appears as a language unsuitable for musical associations!

Come to the question of the language of a song, and real and famous difficulties are presented. Grant that both singer and audience are thoroughly familiar with the language of the original text, and the choice is made easy. But how often does that happen?

The foreign languages heard in our concert-rooms are a bad joke at which no one laughs. In particular, what French does one hear! Yet it is a well-nigh established convention that the foreign languages of singers who can have studied only by the correspondence system should be seriously considered, while the singing of an English version is infra dignitatem.

At the same time it is too true that English versions of some things—of 'Carmen,' say, and 'Rigoletto,' and Debussy's songs—are also only too likely to be jokes just as bad. No doubt the difficulty is not to be determined by a principle. Cases must be treated on their merits. Translation must sometimes be allowed to be downright impossible—of 'Figaro' into German, Wagner into French, 'Pelléas' and 'Louise' into English.

And then the difference between musical and verbal values varies much in songs from age to age. In some of the decorative classic Italian music, the words count hardly at all. On the other hand, one has observed earnest German singers showing signs of growing excitement over ballads of Loewe, without one's understanding the cause in the least—for one had failed to get a book of the words, and as for the music, there certainly was no cause for excitement in that. And no more can be said for the music of many modern songs. If the sense of the word escapes you, you have an empty platter.

Singers, we know, all prefer the foreign text, for reasons good and bad. They have learnt it, and it has become a habit. And even if they have learnt it badly, they can assume that they know more about it than the average listener. The bad singer trusts to the foreign language to obscure faults which English would show up.

Most singers under-estimate the force of the words of a song. They have the habit of trusting to the sheer musical effect of their art—but unwisely, since verbal effect is a force, and most voices are not such instruments that they can afford to dispense with it.

How rare the singer who grasps at all the means possible to interest us! Most are convinced of the sufficient interest of their tone. If anyone wants an example of the force of words in music, let him observe the time-defying vogue of 'Elijah' in England. If it had been sung to a German, or even to an inferior English text, would it not now be as forgotten as anything of Spohr's?

It is humiliating, coming to Schubert, to have to use, in order to be intelligible, the German names of his songs. For some eighty or ninety years they have been on the whole more sung, no doubt, than any other master's songs; and although the original texts have ruled in the London concert-rooms and in the drawing-rooms of the highly cultivated, the mass of Schubert-singing in the homes of England has certainly been in English. But what English? So little authoritative and acceptable that if I want to speak to you of a million-times sung song I must say 'Geheimes' or 'Du bist die Ruh'.' In a few years' time, when this book of Messrs. Fox-Strangways and Steuart Wilson will have made its way, no doubt 'Love's Answer' and 'The Inner Light' will say enough.

The book contains an English text, together with the vocal line of a hundred and twenty-four songs. Two are, without explanation, printed twice over—'Lachen und Weinen' ('Smiles and Tears') and 'Litanei' ('Litany'). The selection includes the whole of the two cycles, 'Die Schöne Müllerin' ('The Maid o' the Mill') and 'Die Winterreise' ('The Wintry Road'). Let us at once say that the English of these two cycles is superior to most of the rest. And there is a prose summary of each—the writing of a master-pen. Yet we must ask, Why 'Wintry Road'? These English titles will, at the best, have a hard fight to become established. Surely literalness should have been followed wherever possible?

The rest of the book gives us very nearly all the well-known Schubert and a good deal that is far from being well-known in England. Indeed, one of its virtues will be to send a good many of us humbly back to that neglected mine, full of gems of purest ray serene.

Dear Schubert, how can we praise you enough? Dear, lovely music, inexhaustibly gushing from the pages so long as we like to keep them open, how can we ever have borne to neglect you? Schubert is the country, the sunlight, young love! The labour of our authors in making this translation was huge, but they are to be envied for the satisfaction of thus having rendered something to the sweet benefactor whom the rest of us know not any way of repaying.

The preface mentions 'Heidenröslein' and 'Der König in Thule' as songs that have 'entirely defeated' these translators. Several numbers of the 'Swan Song' are missing (being perhaps left for another volume), notably 'Liebesbotschaft,' 'Kriegers Ahnung,' 'In der Ferne,' and Schubert's last song, the 'Taubenpost.' Other famous songs omitted are 'Lob der Thränen' (which, however, is probably not among anyone's prime favourites nowadays), 'Sei mir gegrüsst' (a terror for the translator), 'Die Forelle,' 'Rastlose Liebe,' and the Romance from 'Rosamunde.'

What freakish fate is it that has chosen some songs of Schubert to be famous rather than others? We ask it when we come across such perfect beauties as 'Das Zügenglöcklein' and 'Still sitz' ich,' which seem never to be sung.

Mr. Fox-Strangways has not been able to spare space for any of the tremendous narrative songs, which are really solo cantatas, calling for orchestral accompaniment. We applaud him for embracing such splendid things as 'Prometheus,' 'Ganymed,' 'Grenzen der Menschheit,' and others of that class, which, if not actually neglected, are not the everyday Schubert.

The spurious 'Adieu' is of course omitted, as befits a musicianly book. The mystery is that it should be over and over again reprinted is such albums as Peters's, Augener's, and Boosey's.

The music is given as a rule in a transposed key when the original rises above F. 'Wonne der Wehmut' ('Idle Tears'), however, is left in C minor, where it is impossibly high for most singers. The accompanist is referred to the Breitköpf and to the Peters editions. But between pp. 146-161 songs are ascribed to Peters's vol. 1, which are as a matter of fact in vols. 2, 3, 4, and 7.

A few misprints have crept in. Thus D♭ for D♯ in line 3 of 'Mit dem grünen Lautenbande' ('Content'), and B♯ for B♭ in 'Erstarrung' ('The Frozen Heart'), p. 55, at the beginning of line 7. Appoggiaturas are missing from the first page of 'Wohin?' ('The Brook').

One or two suggestions may be offered for increasing the usefulness of the book in future editions. There are hardly any dynamic indications, and singers will have to write these in. The names of the original poets should also be given. It should touch the singer's imagination to know that he is giving voice to a version of Goethe or Heine, and even the humble Müller may (as an act of grace more than of duty) be borne in remembrance. A further addition which would be of interest without encroaching on space would be the dates of the songs. Those blessed fourteen years from 'Gretchen at the Spinning Wheel' to the 'Swan Song'! We like to know just what is due to each of them.

It would not be fair to other clever pens to suggest that this is the first time the art of translating the classics of song has been seriously exercised. But it is pretty certain that it has never before been distinguished by such a talent working on such a scale. A hundred and twenty-four songs! It can be appreciated only by those who have had experience of the cruel puzzles the art presents. How hours and days may be sacrificed to the untying of one knotted line!

The translators of the past have not usually had the leisure for that. One has the impression that they took up the task light-heartedly—this task of sweat and tears! Think of the translator (M. X. Hayes) of all the songs in the big 'Royal' collection, which has probably been most widely used of English editions of Schubert. While for the most part not too bad (and much better than many), the Hayes translations are easy-going, humdrum, and pretty consistently evade the difficulties which an ambitious translator would feel bound to tackle.

Probably it is more than any one mortal man's job. The new book has two names on its cover, and the preface acknowledges help from others, including Mr. Alexander Gray, who gives Scottish dialect versions for four songs, and Mr. Paul England, who has done capital work in the cause before now. Even so, these pages do not invariably hit on ideally happy turns, and probably they will be improved as time goes on by jottings sent in by Schubertians from here and there.

The praise of Mr. Fox-Strangways and his friends is that already many and many times here they have established the right, the happy and untouchable English for Schubert. There are passages of comparative failure, but let us say that at their best these authors abound in the first faculty wanted—they write charmingly singable English. Take 'Wohin?':

> Among the rocks and heather I heard a tiny rill,
> It sparkled in the sunlight and prattled down the hill.
> I know not why it drew me—I never questioned why;
> We could not choose but follow, my trusty staff and I.

At the end of those four pages we say that 'Wohin?' now has its definitive English text. And it is not alone. If the song-translator has a terrible burden, there are recompenses. He does not hope as a rule to be more than a makeshift, but he can on occasion improve a song. 'Improve a song of Schubert's!' Well, the poetry of Schubert's songs is sometimes ridiculous, and sometimes his accentuation is faulty. The translator will enjoy the privilege of doing a little amending. After all, his job is to write English, and there are things in German poetry which cannot be articulated in serious English. Mr. Fox-Strangways has not tackled 'Adelaide,' but if he had, he would have had to invent something to take the place of those dreadful pansies which spring up with Adelaide's name on the petals. The German miller in 'Ungeduld' wishes to sow his sweetheart's name in mustard-and-cress on every flower-bed. Mr. Fox-Strangways's miller says, instead:

> I hear it when the aspen whispers low,
> I see it written where the kingcups blow.

Turn to 'The Wintry Road.' In 'The Weather-cock' the German lover reproaches his lost sweetheart rather pettily with being 'a wealthy bride.' But A. H. F. S.:

> What's pain to them who but deride it?
> And what to me their daughter sold?

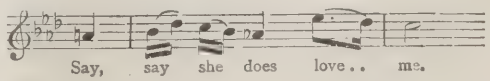
In 'Der Lindenbaum' the lover is no longer so desperate—so absurdly desperate—as not to pick up his hat when it has blown off. A. H. F. S. earns our thanks by leaving that absurd hat out of it altogether. The 'Lindenbaum,' by the way, becomes 'The Old Elm,' and we applaud. The linden is nothing much of a tree. It has nothing much of a past in English poetry. Whereas the elm! And see what is made of the first stanza:

> A well beyond the archway, an elm beside the well—
> I've dreamed beneath its branches more dreams than I can tell.
> Of all the letters carved there, there's one I've chiselled plain;
> And still, when I go by it, it calls me back again.

I think that justifies the introduction of the elm—even if, as someone has said, it is not easy to carve on the elm's bark.

Among the early 'Maid of the Mill' songs one is inclined to question the last line of the 'Neugierige' ('The Question'):



'Does' on the crotchet seems a trifle awkward—we feel that 'love' must somehow come there (perhaps because of so many years of 'Sag', Bächlein, liebt sie mich?'), and should have voted for 'Say, does my love love me?'—the turn of the Hayes translation. Why, in the recitative of the same song, does A. H. F. S. shun 'Yes!' for the 'Ja!'? He uses 'Ay!' which sounds ambiguous, and, moreover, he spells it 'Aye.'

There are many felicities one had marked for quotation. (What of this, from the 'Stürmische Morgen'—'That's what I call a morning just after my own heart'?) But there are weaker patches. The last two lines of 'Am Meer' will not do—they miss the immeasurable pathos of the music, as well as Heine's simplicity. The first line of 'Aufenthalt' will not do—'Moor-stream in spate.' No one will want to sing 'spate' on the low A. By some means the stream must be made to come on the A. There are good things in 'The Erl King,' but sometimes it is disconcerting. 'Mein sohn' becomes 'my boy.' 'Sei ruhig' becomes 'There, there, boy! There is nothing to mind.' The English, in fact, a little outdoes the German in homeliness. But to a German the story is homely. To an Englishman it is wild and far-away folk-lore. One touch seems quite wrong. After the Erl King's second speech, the English boy cries:

> O father, O father, there down by the whins,
> The Erl King's maidens where dusk just begins.

Dusk? But the whole picture surely is a midnight picture, and half the horror goes if after all dusk is only beginning. The penultimate quatrain seems to us weak. The famous 'poser' of the last line is solved by cutting off the first semiquaver and fitting to the rest, 'In his arms the boy was dead.'

Our authors, whose English is so sensible and singable, surely go to excess in their use of dialect words. Current English could be vastly enriched from dialects, no doubt, but is song translation the right channel of introduction? The miller's brook is 'my faithful fere.' In the next song, 'A cypress grove shall bield him now.' 'Ranger' is good (instead of the usual 'huntsman') for the miller's rival, but he is warned from approaching the mill-leat and the gradely hind. Frequenters of Wigmore Hall would probably understand the original German words better.

As a general rule, quick songs seem to translate better than slow examples. Over and over again perfectly charming equivalents are here found for the quick songs. Is English a quicker language than German? One has now and then the impression that in A. H. F. S.'s English the slow songs will want to move at something rather more than the Gerhardt pace.

The authors promise us a Schumann volume to put alongside this, and the publishers of Brahms and Wolf will be fortunate if those great men, too, can be similarly treated. C.

'The Margin of Music.' By Edwin Evans. [Oxford University Press, 3*s.* 6*d.*]

'Step-Children of Music.' By Eric Blom. [Foulis, 6*s.*]

During Mr. Evans's all-too-brief editorship of the Musical News and Herald, he delivered himself of a series of 'leaders' that were models of their kind. Some of these have been rescued, revised, and expanded, the result being another of the attractive booklets known as the 'Oxford Musical Essays.' Mr. Evans left the task of selection to other hands, on the ground that a journalist is not the best judge when the claims of the topical and genera have to be considered. This may be so; but seeing the frequency with which the topical becomes general, the line should not be drawn too narrowly. There are eleven articles in this book: I believe the number could have been raised to twenty without the level of excellence being reduced. But probably the limits imposed by the size of the 'Essays' was the deciding factor. Of the chosen eleven, I have especially enjoyed re-reading 'Taste,' 'The Passing of the Top E flat,' 'Two Pianos,' 'The Fifth Wheel,' and 'Seeing is Believing.'

Apparently Mr. Evans is not an enthusiast for 'musical appreciation' methods of the kind so much practised nowadays. He admits that the palate has to be educated. The question is, How?

> There appears to be a current belief that the best way of educating the musical palate is to take its owner into the musical kitchen. I cannot bring myself to believe that the true gourmet graduates in this fashion. Taste is formed by tasting, not by observing the chef.

The 'musical appreciation' specialists might fairly retort that the analogy suffers from the fact that we must eat, but we may listen to music; so our taste in food is always being formed automatically, whereas that in music has to be taken in hand specially. Nevertheless there is a good deal in Mr. Evans's point. Perhaps some day we shall see that we need do little more for the musical palate than for the dietetic. When people have regular and frequent facilities for hearing all kinds of good music, they will need little or nothing in the way of information about the construction either of the work or the instrument on which it is played. If the second subject is of the type to be enjoyed, they will enjoy it though they may not know it is the second, and may be even less conscious of the fact that its reappearance towards the close of the movement is in the tonic. The numerous children's concerts now being given are so excellent an enterprise that one would hate to risk an appearance of throwing the tiniest drop of cold water, but some of us may have the ghost of a doubt about the lecturettes, the putting of orchestral members through their paces, and the introduction of certain factors that are necessarily concerned with the purely external side of things. Isn't there a risk that the interest and enjoyment shown by the children may be after all a good deal less in the actual music than we fondly imagine it to be? The biggest step towards developing a taste for the best (I carefully avoid the horrid word 'appreciation') is familiarity. I believe more is done by getting the children familiar beforehand with the main themes of the works they are about to hear than by talking to them at the concert. Something of this preliminary work is now being done, the youngsters having the themes played to them, or, when possible, singing them. This is 'tasting,' not 'observing the chef.'

Mr. Evans writes pleasantly on the pianoforte duet, especially that for two instruments; practically and ironically on the extreme claims of some mental score readers; and—as recent events have proved, alas!—far too optimistically on 'The Passing of the top E flat.' When he wrote it certainly looked as if coloratura singing was on its last legs, but we know better now. The clock has recently been put back, and the British public has even been willing to hand over a few thousands of the best to the hand that put it back. But it is well that Mr. Evans's chapter (which thus becomes merely prophetic) has been reprinted, if only for the sake of the anecdote with which he concludes:

> The age of the singer who did nothing but vocalise has definitely passed away. Singers will no longer ride to fame on a rainbow of roulades. Of course, the commercial side of music cannot entirely ignore that there is still an unsophisticated public ready to pay good money for the E flat in 'Traviata.' But a singer who was advised to include the aria for that reason in her programme retorted by inquiring whether it would not suffice for her to step on the platform and say, 'Ladies and gentlemen, I am requested by the management to prove to your satisfaction that I can sing a good E flat. Here it is . . . and now we will get on with some music.'

And when one sees the inane—not to say insane—delight with which the public hangs on to these expensive top notes one is bound to admit that many a famous aria has no more raison d'être than the anecdote implies. But I wish Mr. Evans had gone on to tell us what the agent said to this intrepid singer (whom many of us can identify without much effort, I fancy).

The title of Mr. Blom's book does not at first glance give us an idea of its contents. These 'stepchildren,' it turns out, are works > . . . chosen freely from two centuries of musical history . . . linked together by the pathetic circumstance of having come into the world to be music's stepchildren, ignored by the public at large, and scarcely likely to be made the subject of special study by the professional critic.

The ground is well chosen, because it enables a writer to collect and make palatable a lot of out-of-the-way information on forgotten or rarely-heard works. Mr. Blom's 'stepchildren' are a variegated crowd, ranging from Beethoven's Bagatelles to Delius's 'Fennimore and Gerda,' Franck's songs to Reger's organ music, and Cherubini's church music to Elgar's 'Falstaff.' (A national disgrace that such a masterpiece as 'Falstaff' should ever qualify for inclusion among this neglected brood!) These twenty-five essays are reprinted from various periodicals, and are well worth it. Seventeen illustrations (portraits, &c.) enhance the book's attractiveness. But after all the main thing is Mr. Blom's sympathetic and well-informed treatment of his subjects. The average musical reader will enjoy it, and the lecturer and writer will find it a valuable source of data on many unhackneyed subjects. H. G.

Gramophone Notes

By 'DISCUS'

The gramophonist is in clover just now. This month sees the issue of a Bach Violin Sonata, two of Beethoven's Quartets, the 'Jupiter' Symphony, Brahms's No. 1, and the Schumann Pianoforte Concerto, all without cuts. This condition of things would have been impossible a few years ago, and is a conclusive proof that the public for good music is growing. It would be interesting to hear how the output of works of this kind in this country compares with that abroad. Perhaps one of my American or Canadian correspondents will drop me a line. (Which reminds me that the writer of a recent letter from Durban omitted to sign his name, and so could not be answered. I take this opportunity of thanking him for his note about a particular sound-box, and will make a point of looking into the matter soon.)

ÆOLIAN-VOCALION

Beethoven's C sharp minor Quartet, played by the London String Quartet, is recorded on four 12-in. d.-s. It is too much to expect uniform excellence to be spread over such a long bit of recording. The general level is good, with the best results in the opening fugue and in the final Allegro. My only complaint is on the score of sonority: the effect is perhaps a bit attenuated. I don't care to dogmatise on the point, because we know that the gramophone plays curious tricks, and what 'comes off' on one instrument is sometimes only moderately successful on another. Moreover, we know much can be done by judicious experimenting with sound-boxes, needles, &c. That, however, calls for more time than a reviewer can always spare. But that there may be something in my complaint as to lack of sonority seems to be shown by the splendid results achieved in the 12-in. d.-s. of Adila Fachiri and Jelly d'Aranyi. They play movements from Sonatas for two violins by Pugnani (Allegro assai and Allegro vivace), and Boccherini (Andante espressivo), with Ethel Hobday as their first-rate colleague at the pianoforte. Better playing and recording could not be wished for, and the music is well worth it, especially the Pugnani. Some day the gramophone will give us the same perfect results from all the four instruments of a quartet. At present such success is apt to be in patches, and there are evidently a few problems not yet fully solved.

The record of the Life Guards Band playing the 'Flying Dutchman' Overture disappointed me. This is due, I think, less to any shortcomings of playing and recording than to the fact of the music itself suffering from transcription (12-in. d.-s.).

The Company has put forth some capital vocal records: Armand Tokatyan in the 'Flower Song' from 'Carmen' and 'O Paradiso' from 'L'Africaine' (12-in. d.-s.); Elena Gerhardt in Strauss's 'Cäcilie' and Brahms's 'Vergebliches Ständchen' (10-in. d.-s.); Watcyn Watcyns in the second set of 'Four Salt-Water Ballads' (very musical singing, but less clear in articulation than some of Mr. Watcyns's previous efforts, and surely his piano effects are obtained by withdrawing from the receiver rather than by reducing the tone? Anyway, they have a 'faked' sound (12-in. d.-s.); and Malcolm McEachern in 'O tu palermo' and 'Lord God of Abraham' (12-in. d.-s.). I gather that the former is not a new record, but has formerly been issued as a single-sided. It shows Mr. McEachern's voice to fine advantage. The 'Elijah' air is less convincing. It is too strenuous—threatening, rather than prayerful.

COLUMBIA

Although Brahms's style of orchestration is against recording, a good level of excellence is reached in the five 12-in. d.-s. just issued by Columbia. The players are the London Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Weingartner. The least successful passage seems to be the Introduction to the first movement, where there is some lack of clearness. Otherwise one finds little cause for complaint. There is the vigour that we expect, and in the quiet middle movements a lot of the beauty is captured. As usual with its big works, the Company issues this fine set in an album, with annotations on each page.

A 12-in. d.-s. of Gounod's Overture to 'Mirella' gives us a chance of making acquaintance with a pleasant work showing the composer in a vein unfamiliar to most of us. There is a curious smack of Edward German about it, not only in one of its chief themes, but also in the harmonization. The players are the New Queen's Hall Light Orchestra, under Frank Bridge. A good record.

A successful bit of recording is that of the Scherzo, Trio, and Finale of Brahms's Trio in E flat, Op. 40, played by Arthur Catterall, W. H. Squire, and William Murdoch. Not only is the balance first-rate, but the pianoforte tone is as good as any I remember hearing viâ the gramophone. As the music is Brahms in very attractive vein, this record should be among the 'best-sellers' of the chamber music department.

Mr. Squire is apparently a kind of musical Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. We heard Dr. Jekyll in the Brahms; here is Mr. Hyde in a couple of solos—a 'Hebridean Cattle Croon' and 'Home, sweet Home.' The latter is about as sickly an affair as can be. I thought I knew all that the 'cello can do in the way of expressing nostalgia, but Mr. Squire manages to squeeze out a bit more, aided by lots of portamento and a very slow tempo. I hope next time there is solo recording to be done the player will be Dr. Jekyll (10-in. d.-s.).

The Westminster Glee Singers are heard in Bridge's 'The Goslings' and German's 'O Peaceful Night,' using most of the tricks that disfigure the work of male-voice quartets in general—phrases nearly all cut into short lengths, time erratic, all the points underlined (10-in. d.-s.). It is to be hoped that gramophonists who hear this record will hear also the 10-in. d.-s. of the Kedroff Quartet, which will show them how four men ought to sing together. The voices are fine to begin with (a real tenor top line, instead of a falsetto, by the way), but the outstanding excellences are the blend, grading of power, and, above all, the rhythm. The fact of the singing being in Russian, and the meaning of the songs unknown, matters little. Ten out of every twelve of our English male-voice quartets ought to be locked up with this record for an hour or two. One of the first things they would do on being released would be to sack their male alto before settling down to practices on new lines. At least, I hope so.

A fine operatic record is that of Frank Mullings and Harold Williams in a couple of duets from Verdi's 'Otello.' Mullings is a bit on the over-strenuous side, but it seems to matter less than usual; Harold Williams is capital, and his clear articulation is a feature. The musical value of this record is refreshing after the pyrotechnic inanities we too often get (12-in. d.-s.).

Other vocal records are of Norman Allin in Graham Peel's 'Song of the Wooden-Legged Fiddler' and 'Pro Peccatis' from Rossini's 'Stabat Mater' (12-in. d.-s.); Edna Thomas in a negro spiritual and love song (10-in. d.-s.), and the Evangelist, Gipsy Smith, in some of his songs and hymns (four 10-in. d.-s.).

H.M.V.

The 'Jupiter' Symphony records are so successful that one cannot but be astonished at the work having had to wait so long for a place in the gramophone library. The bulk of the music is the very thing for the purpose. Paragraphs have appeared telling us that various experiments were tried in making this record. Whatever they were, the result shows them to have been justified. Albert Coates conducts, and the players are the Symphony Orchestra. This performance and record in an unusual degree reminds us of a fact that we have recently been forgetting—namely, that the size of a piece of music depends little on how long it takes to perform, or how many players it keeps busy. The 'Jupiter,' with its slender scoring, its modest length (compared with modern symphonies), and its diatonic harmony, is as unmistakably great as lots of modern so-called 'big' works are merely tumid. The 'Jupiter' fills seven sides, the remaining side giving us the jolly little 'Impresario' Overture.

If the recording of the Schumann Pianoforte Concerto is less successful, it is mainly because of the two problems involved—the pianoforte tone and the question of balance. There is, however, a better result than usual. The players are Cortôt and the Albert Hall Orchestra, with Sir Landon Ronald conducting. This capital record of one of the most popular of concertos is on four 12-in. d.-s. As if these riches were not enough, the Company proceeds almost to embarrass us with further delights. Here is Beethoven's Quartet in F, Op. 18, No. 1, played by the Catterall Quartet—highly-finished playing of this engaging work. It fills seven sides; on the eighth is the Scherzo from Tchaikovsky's Quartet in F, Op. 22.

Finally, we have a capital bit of work in William Primrose's playing of Bach's Sonata in A, four movements, and all delightful (two 12-in. d.-s.). A feature worth mentioning is the excellence of the balance, the pianoforte part being rightly treated as something more than a mere background. It is excellently played by Mr. Templeman. The H.M.V. is to be praised for thus giving a good show to an unusually promising young English violinist, and above all, for letting the show be made with fine music instead of snippets and arrangements. I believe that most musicians will enjoy such records as these again and again long after such poor trifles as some recent ones of Kreisler are forgotten.

Among the vocal records one turns first to the Galli-Curci, only to find her engaged with some indifferent music—the 'Slumber Song' and 'Bellàh! capretta adorata!' from 'Dinorah,' and Bishop's futile 'Pretty mocking bird.' The latter is sung as you expect it to be, and voice and flute have a pretty encounter, but that's all there is to it—which of course is enough for the crowds who are concerned with sound rather than sense. An unexpectedly amusing effect occurs during the Bishop song, where the words 'Pretty mocking bird' suddenly make us aware that Madame is singing in English—slightly broken English, of course (12-in. d.-s.).

Fine singing is heard from Dinh Gilly in airs from 'La Bohème' and 'Il Tabarro,' the latter a welcome bit of one of the three one-Act operas Puccini wrote a few years ago.

Elsie Suddaby sings in Lane Wilson's arrangement of the old song 'Shepherd, thy demeanour vary,' and 'The Virgin's Lullaby,' from Boughton's 'Bethlehem' (10-in. d.-s.). Miss Suddaby has a good 'recording' voice, and makes quite a brilliant thing of the old English song.

A PUBLIC SCHOOLBOY 'BACH CHOIR'

In our last issue we gave a report of a Bach performance at the Leys School, Cambridge, the singers being a Bach choir formed among the boys. We have since had a talk with Mr. J. F. Shepherdson, the music-master to whose enthusiasm the inception of this unusual choir is due. We began by expressing surprise at the school's evident liking for such severe fare.

'Well,' said Mr. Shepherdson, 'when we began the Bach recitals in 1920, some fears were expressed on that point. "Wasn't it rather too highbrow?" asked the doubters. But the scheme was quickly established, and now at the beginning of every school year we start working on a Bach Cantata, and it gives us the best kind of send-off. The choir is enthusiastic; practices are voluntary, but there is no difficulty in keeping up the attendances. Similarly, boys may please themselves as to being present at the performances, but the absentees average only thirty-five out of two hundred and fifty, so you see it is not a case of music appealing only to a select few. And the two hundred odd who attend have a special practice for such of the items as they are supposed to take part in—a chorale verse in the cantata, or a verse in connection with a chorale prelude played on the organ, for example.'

'The actual choir is, of course, small?'

'We generally muster nearly fifty—say twenty-two trebles, six altos, six tenors, and ten basses. Membership is confined to the boys, though we have sometimes had the assistance of a tenor from Trinity College Chapel.'

'How much rehearsal do you find necessary—or, rather, possible?' we asked.

'The school time-table allows one period of forty-five minutes weekly for choir practice. The rest of the work is done in the boys' own time—say, trebles three times a week, immediately after dinner, for about a quarter of an hour at a time; the rest of the choir twice a week for a quarter of an hour.'

'How about orchestra?'

'No boys in that department, thanks! I have the best I can get from the University in the way of strings, with wind players from London. Soloists first-rate too—Dorothy Silk, Louis Fleury, and so on. And I am lucky in being able to count on the regular help of Mr. Bernhard Ord at the organ.'

The elaborate programme book of the latest Bach recital, with its music-type illustrations, ample notes, &c., was so obviously an expensive item, that it led us to inquire about the financial side of the venture.

'Every boy in the school pays a subscription of four shillings a term to the Musical Society, which thus has an income of £50 a term. This sees us through.'

The programmes so far given have included five cantatas (complete); about a dozen chorales and arias from other cantatas; seven instrumental items (suites or extracts therefrom); and a good number of organ solos.

The whole record of the past five years is a remarkable example of what can be done in a school where the resources are not large enough to justify the attacking of large-scale choral works. We think Mr. Shepherdson has hit on a happy idea in thus directing the energies of his choir into a department of Bach's music where the modest size of his force is an advantage rather than a drawback.

The reader must not imagine, however, that the music of the Leys School begins and ends with Bach. There is an Orpheus Club of twenty-five members which meets every Sunday evening for papers, discussions, and recitals; Michaelmas term had its carol concert; in the Lent term there was a concert of English songs with Anne Thursfield as soloist; twice annually there are school concerts at which only boys and masters perform; the breaking-up concerts consist of good light music with folk-songs sung by the whole school; and it goes without saying that organ recitals of the very best quality are regular features.

We are glad to be able to add the above to the particulars given in the Musical Times during the past few years as to the admirable musical work now being done in public schools. How much more flourishing the musical life of the country would be to-day had such enthusiastic and well-directed efforts been common a quarter of a century ago!

HANDEL'S 'SEMELE'

By W. Barclay Squire

The last few years have witnessed a remarkable revival of interest in Handel's operas. 'Rodelinda,' 'Giulio Cesare,' 'Serse,' and others have been performed in Germany, Switzerland, and the United States, and have proved something more than mere successes of archæological interest. Everyone knows that Handel's operas contain many beautiful songs, but hitherto the difficulties in the way of their revival have caused them to be entirely neglected. Chief among these obstacles is the fact that the principal male parts were written for artificial sopranos. In the recent performances abroad these parts have been adapted for male voices, and though the result is sometimes not altogether satisfactory (for no modern tenor or baritone can cope with roulades written for singers like Senesino or Caffarelli), if these works are to be revived at all, it seems the only possible way of surmounting the difficulty. In the present state of operatic affairs in England, it is hardly to be wondered at that Handel's adopted country should have left it to Germany to take the lead in reviving his neglected operas. It would be interesting to hear them sung in the original Italian, but it is impossible that there should be time to devote to their study in the few weeks' season of Italian opera in London. Even less hopeful seems the prospect of their performance in English. It is therefore very much to the credit of Cambridge amateurs that they should have decided to stage 'Semele' this month. Though the work was written later than the long series of Handel's Italian operas, the libretto was originally intended for stage performance; and Handel's setting, announced on its first production as 'after the manner of an Oratorio,' is described in the diary kept by the Earl of Egmont (who heard the second performance) as 'the opera of "Semele."'

The libretto has a rather interesting history. It was written by William Congreve, and was probably intended by him to be produced at the Queen's Theatre at the time when he and Vanbrugh were the patentees. The exact dates are variously given. Sir Edmund Gosse, in his 'Life of Congreve,' follows Cibber; but Burney has pointed out that Cibber's account of the attempts at introducing opera made by Congreve and Vanbrugh is incorrect, and Burney's own corrections need further emendations. The matter cannot here be gone into, and it is enough to note that from 1705 onwards, operas were performed at both Drury Lane and the Queen's Theatre. None were successful until, in 1711, Handel's 'Rinaldo' took the town by storm. It is to this period that Congreve's 'Semele' belongs. Baker gives the year of its first publication as 1707, but no copy with this date is known, and the earliest edition that can be traced is in vol. 2 of Congreve's works, published by Tonson in 1710. This edition contains a preface in which the following interesting passage occurs:

> It was not thought requisite to have any Regard either to Rhyme, or Equality of Measure, in the Lines of that Part of the Dialogue which was design'd for the Recitative Stile in Musick. For as that Stile in Musick is not confin'd to the strict Observation of Time and Measure, which is requir'd in the Compositions of Airs and Sonata's, so neither is it necessary that the same Exactness in Numbers, Rhymes, or Measure, should be observed in Words design'd to be set in that manner, which must ever be observed in the Formation of Odes and Sonnets. For, what they call Recitative in Musick is only a more tuneable Speaking; it is a kind of Prose in Musick; its Beauty consists in coming near Nature, and in improving the natural Accents of Words by more Pathetick or Emphatical Tones.

Congreve's libretto was set to music by John Eccles, who was Master of the Queen's Musick, and some years earlier had gained the second prize in the competition for setting Congreve's 'Judgment of Paris.' It is almost certain that his 'Semele' was never performed—probably owing to the unsuccess of the operatic experiments at the Queen's Theatre, and to Congreve's retirement from the management. The only manuscript of the work that is known is in the Library of the Royal College of Music (MS. 183). It formerly belonged to a Mr. T. B. Elcon, who lived at Avignon; it may possibly have been taken to France by John Eccles's son, Henry, who settled at Paris about 1710. The manuscript is undated, and wants some pages both at the beginning and the end. It follows Congreve's libretto closely. Semele, Ino, and Cupid are sopranos; Athamas, alto; Cadmus, Jupiter, Somnus, Apollo, and the Chief Priest, basses; the Augurs, alto and tenor. The accompaniments are written for strings (in the Somnus scene with 'Leads upon the Instruments'), and figured bass for double-bass and harpsichord. The work is interesting, for it is a genuine opera, and it helps to fill the gap in English dramatic music between the death of Purcell and the supremacy of Handel. If ever English 'Denkmäler' like those in Austria, Bavaria, and Germany, are published, Eccles's 'Semele' ought certainly to find a place in the series.

Congreve's libretto lay unused for over thirty years, until Handel took possession of it, and—with the help of some unknown collaborator—turned it into 'The Story of Semele,' which was produced 'after the manner of an Oratorio' at Covent Garden on February 10, 1744. The autograph score is preserved in the Royal Collection—formerly at Buckingham Palace, but now on permanent loan at the British Museum. Handel notes that the work was 'angefangen den 3. June 1743,' and Act 1 was finished on June 13. 'Fine dell Atto 2^do.) [Monday] 20 June 1743,' is on f. 77v., and on the last page, 'G. F. Handel London) [Monday] July 4, 1743. Völlig geendiget.' A comparison of the autograph, Congreve's libretto, and the published full score of the German Handel Society, reveals several interesting points. Handel seems to have had the original libretto before him while writing, though using the alterations of the anonymous adapter. In the opening scene he began by a version of the recitative ('Behold! Auspicious flames') for 'Priest or Cadmus,' which he cancelled by pasting down the next page, containing the present version. Similar instances occur throughout the Act, and the part of Athamas—almost throughout the work—was originally written in the tenor clef, but subsequently altered for alto. Semele's recitative, 'Ah me, for pity' (H.G., p. 25), is marked 'All[egro],' and 'See, she blushing turns,' is set as an air for Ino. 'Thy aid, pronubial Juno' (Athamas's recitative, No. 13 of Novello's octavo edition) is marked 'apart.' 'Turn, hopeless lover' (No. 16) is a recitative for soprano. The Sinfonia (No. 24) at the beginning of Act 2 is absent; 'With adamant the gates are barr'd (octavo score, p. 84) is marked 'All[egro].' Scene 2 is 'An apartement in the Palace of Semele, she is sleeping; Loves and Zephirs waiting.' 'Come, Zephirs, come,' an air for Cupid (as in Congreve's libretto), follows: this is unpublished. 'Semele wakes and rises,' and sings 'O sleep' (octavo score, No. 30). 'Where'er you walk' (No. 40) has an interesting alteration. The passage before the Da Capo was originally written thus:

turn your eyes, wher - e'er you tread the blush - ing flow'rs shall rise, And all . . things flour - ish, Wher - e'er you turn your eyes, wher -
D.C.
- e'er you turn your eyes, wher-e'er you turn your eyes.

Handel subsequently changed this by crossing out bars 2-6 and altering bar 1 to the present version. There is an earlier version of 'Bless the glad earth' (No. 44) which is crossed out, and a cancelled version of 'Somnus, awake' (No. 46). Scene 3, 'Semele in an apartment, enter Juno as Ino, with a mirrour in her Hand'—'Behold, in this mirror' (octavo score, p. 146) is set as an air (unpublished). At the end of the work Handel began to set Congreve's words for the final chorus, 'Then mortals be merry,' but replaced them by 'Happy, happy' (No. 76). There are many minor points in the autograph which do not appear in the German full score. These it is hoped will be noticed in the catalogue now in preparation of Handel's manuscripts in the Royal Collection.

A comparison of Handel's setting with Congreve's libretto shows that the book was much altered from its original form. Apart from the interpolated airs, such as 'The morning lark' and 'Where'er you walk,' the action was made obscure by the omission of stage directions. At the end of Scene 1 of Act 1

'All but the Priests come forward. The Scene closes on the Priests, and shows to view the front and outside of the Temple. Cadmus leads off Semele, attendants follow. Athamas and Ino remain.' The parts of the Augurs were omitted, and as the Second Augur ends the Act by singing 'Endless pleasure' (which Handel gives to Semele, though she has already been carried away by the eagle), this alteration makes the end of the Act dramatically absurd. Scene 1 of Act 2 is

> . . . a pleasant Country, the Prospect is terminated by a Beautiful Mountain adorn'd with Woods and Waterfalls. Juno and Iris descend in different Machines. Juno in a Chariot drawn by Peacocks; Iris on a Rainbow, and at the end of the scene 'they ascend.'

The whole Act is much altered. In Scene 6 of Act 3, 'Juno appears in her chariot ascending,' and after the catastrophe (Scene 7) and the disappearance of Semele, 'Jupiter re-ascends swiftly. The scene totally changed represents a pleasant Country, Mount Citheron closing the Prospect.' In restoring 'Semele' as an opera, these notes on its original form may be found of use.

Handel's work was produced on February 10, 1744, when his affairs were at a low ebb. The oratorios which were given at Covent Garden to fight the opposition operas at the King's Theatre, though at first successful, were beginning to lose the attraction of novelty. 'Semele' was repeated on February 15, 17, and 22, and was followed by 'Joseph,' on March 2. The season came to an end with Lent, and for the following winter Handel engaged the King's Theatre for twenty-four subscription performances. Here 'Semele'—'with additions and alterations'—was performed on December 1 and 8, but the season ended disastrously in April, and Handel for the second time became bankrupt.

The work was revived by Smith and Stanley in 1762, and in 1878 by the Cambridge University Musical Society. In Germany it has been recently performed (in a much abbreviated version) at Hallé, but, in spite of the beauty and freshness of much of the music, the work still remains practically unknown.

In 1747 Walsh published two sets of 'Songs in Semele,' on February 25 and March 2 respectively, and on March 13, 'Semele entire.' From these publications the names of the original singers can be gathered: Beard was Jupiter; Francesina, Semele; Avoglio, Iris; Miss Young probably doubled the parts of Juno and Ino; Reinhold those of Somnus, Cadmus, and the Priest, and Sullivan (whom Mrs. Delany described as 'a block with a very fine voice'), Athamas.

Occasional Notes

Our Manchester correspondent writes: 'During the Christmas holidays, on the coast, I had my first experience of the famous Besses o' th' Barn band: I am almost ashamed to confess that it was the first, as for years I have been within shouting distance, so to speak, of the centre of its activities. It is now under the guidance of Harry Barlow, who is one of the two great tuba players of the band. He has been with Richter, Nikisch, Weingartner, and the rest of the big conductors. Old Hans Richter would have been as enthusiastic about him as he was about Simon Speelman, Paersch, or Reynolds the oboe-player. Now Barlow having imbibed the finest orchestral musical culture possible to any brass-wind player to-day, is fitted in a very exceptional sense for his leadership of the Besses. On the technical side he can give them all useful tips born of a long and variede experience, and also ensure technique being kept in its place—which is not always the case where a musical organization has been nourished on contest-work. It is his wider outlook on musical life and interpretative powers which is destined to make the future of the Besses o' th' Barn one of importance. I have heard no brass-wind playing since Bayreuth twenty years ago that can compare with these players for golden mellow tone, not forgetting that German tuba-playing and tuba instrument construction are altogether on a different plane from those of British makers' ideals. Had Mendelssohn heard this band he would not have scored his Baal choruses for voices! They play long stretches of "Walkure," "Tristan," and "Parsifal" with a sensitiveness for perspective and colour that leaves one almost breathless at the wonder of it all. The pianist may scoff and call these things "arrangements," and so forth; but in these matters there is gain as well as loss, and on balance the advance in musical appreciation outweighs any shortcomings. A delight of quite a different kind was experienced when they played a simple hymn-tune; how much our choirs might learn from its superb treatment! Those who were lucky enough to be in the Cathedral Close at the Gloucester Festival of 1913 will recall how the chorale "O Haupt voll Blut" was scored by Elgar for brass and played from the top of the South-west porch during the interval in the "St. Matthew" Passion music. My Christmas holiday experience recently brought to remembrance those sensations of soft, mellow, all-pervading tone gently rising and falling on the hushed stillness.'

At the recent celebration of the Jubilee of Leeds University, the honorary degree of Doctor of Letters was conferred on Mr. Herbert Thompson. The new Doctor needs no introduction to the readers of the Musical Times, and we are sure they will join us in hearty congratulations. But only the public north of the Trent is fully aware of the powerful influence for good in artistic matters which Dr. Thompson has exercised for over thirty years by his articles in the Yorkshire Post on music and painting. In presenting Dr. Thompson, Prof. Abercrombie said:

> Herbert Thompson has been for many years accepted as the representative in this city of informed and vivid opinion in the arts of music and painting; and throughout the community of all those who are interested in the intellectual and spiritual life of Northern England, his wholesome influence has long been cordially acknowledged. It is not easy to estimate the debt which we, who must accept the severe conditions of an industrial age, owe to such service and such faith as his. His effort has always been to show us how art, rightly appreciated, may be a continual enlightenment; and from the accidents of idiom to disentangle the beauty and the significance that are enduring. He has brought to this work an exact scholarship which has explored deeply and widely, and has always been inspired by a scrupulous taste; and this has enabled him not only to interpret afresh the masterpieces of the past, but also to give a discriminating welcome to the newest adventures of the present. Such criticism is not to be regarded as merely regulative or corrective; it is a very positive contribution to our highest vitality. It assures for art the condition of its most illustrious and beneficent existence among us; and in us it strengthens that desire for the ideal which only art can satisfy, and the judgment which insists on the purity of its satisfaction.

Critical writing receives little recognition as a constructive, positive thing. Dr. Thompson's confrères welcome his degree and the presentation address as compliments to their generally-maligned profession.

We are sorry to see Sir Richard Terry joining the band of those who think any old stick is good enough to belabour London where music is concerned. In the Queen of December 17, speaking of the decline of British choralism (a decline which is largely imaginary), he says:

> Take our London with its seven millions of inhabitants. What a poverty-stricken array of choral bodies it presents in proportion to its numbers! When we have a new work of anything like big proportions to present, we import one of the provincial choral societies to sing it for us.

Sir Richard's first statement has no force without some kind of statistical evidence. Exact figures would of course be difficult to procure, but we may say that recently, in order to settle a question of this kind, we obtained with very little trouble particulars of a round hundred or so of largish choral societies in the London district—a good many of them with orchestral sections as well. This took no count of the little choirs, forty or fifty strong, which probably run to some hundreds in the suburbs. We believe that if precise figures could be obtained the London area would in the matter of choral music make as good a show as most provincial centres. And in regard to amateur chamber and orchestral music, it would almost certainly be far better.

As for London depending on provincial choral societies for its performances of new works: Without spending time digging into records we recall at once that during the past few seasons London has had its first performances (sometimes the first anywhere) of Holst's 'Ode to Death' and 'Hecuba's Lament,' Delius's 'Requiem' and 'Song of the high hills,' Franck's 'Psyche,' Rachmaninov's 'The Bells,' and a good many works which if not new are at least unfamiliar, such as Stanford's 'Stabat Mater,' Ethel Smyth's 'Mass,' Holst's 'Hymn of Jesus,' Boughton's 'Bethlehem,' Bax's 'Of a rose I sing' and 'Mater ora Filium,' besides a host of smaller unaccompanied pieces by Warlock, Vaughan Williams, Delius, Holst, &c. The list could no doubt be made a long one, had we time to search for material instead of relying on a moment's reflection while writing. Most of the new works were produced by the Philharmonic and Oriana Choirs, the Bach Choir playing up well with the 'Ode to Death' and Stanford's 'Stabat Mater.' Against all this we remember only two visits of provincial choirs for the purpose of singing a new work—that of the Wolverhampton Choir with Vaughan Williams's 'Mass' (a work which has lately been sung by the Special Service Choir at the Abbey), and the Liverpool Welsh Choral Union with Holbrooke's 'Choral Symphony.' To the uninitiated readers of the Queen, Sir Richard's sweeping statement will suggest large and efficient choral bodies streaming from the provinces into musicless London in order to give it a chance of hearing works it is too lazy or too stupid to sing itself. The cold fact being what it is, we can't help thinking of the little girl who told her mother that there were hundreds of cats in the front garden. 'Not hundreds, my child; don't exaggerate!' 'Well, mamma, there are at least two.' Let poor old London have fair play. Its musical weaknesses are many, but most of them are obviously due to the obstacles set up by its immense size.

Sir Walford Davies's attractive methods as a lecturer are so widely appreciated that we are glad to say he has kindly promised to expand into essay form, and publish in this journal, the addresses given by him from time to time as Gresham Lecturer. The first instalment of his opening lecture appears in the present issue.

Writing on Galli-Curci-itis in our November number, we tried to extract a little crumb of comfort from the fact that, with all its bad effect on local musical enterprises, the tour of the singer would at least give sopranos (amateur and professional) a much-needed reminder of the beauty of steady, clean vocal tone. Everybody is aware that the well-known native singers free from the vices of wobble and strain can almost be numbered on the fingers of one's hands. We felt, and still feel, that a valuable lesson might be learnt from the fact that a singer so widely (and, on the whole, justly) acclaimed as Galli-Curci eschews both faults; and we said so—though the comment was so obvious that we hesitated before setting it down. But, after all, we are glad that we were not afraid of the obvious, since it moved Mr. Kaikhosru Sorabji to an amusing outburst in the Musical News and Herald of January 10. After pouring well-deserved abuse on some of the press methods connected with the tour, and making it clear that in his opinion Galli-Curci is a poorish singer with an ordinary voice, he winds up:

> But the crowning bonne bouche of the whole sorry, sordid, and ridiculous business is to be found in the comment—not of an evening rag but of a periodical devoted, or I suppose devoted, to music, since it calls itself a 'Musical something or other,' that young students should be strongly recommended to study Galli-Curci's singing and listen to it because of its steadiness of tone! Steadiness of tone, one of the most elementary requisites without which good singing does not even begin to exist, and as though one would have to listen to Galli-Curci to hear steadiness of tone! As who should say, 'Listen to Cortôt when he plays a five-finger exercise, and see how he plays all the right notes!'

We ought to have wilted at being called a 'Musical something or other' supposed to be devoted to music. But we didn't. Such is the hardihood induced by editorial work! We are not impressed by the Cortôt analogy: it gives over at the knees the moment you glance at it—for of course pianists can play a series of notes correctly and legato, so they listen to Cortôt for lessons of another kind. But if, as a body, English pianists made such a poor show in finger technique as our sopranos and contraltos do in the production of a steady, well-controlled tone, we should by all means advise them to go to Cortôt for an object-lesson of the five-finger type. And we should be prepared to repeat the advice until even Mr. Kaikhosru something-or-other recognised a piece of plain horse sense when he saw it.

Miss Cope, organist at Holy Trinity, Kingsway, has played there for sixty years, and during that period has missed only two services—one through fog, the other through illness. 'I feel like going on for ever,' she told an Evening Standard interviewer. None of 'that played-out feeling' about Miss Cope! We take off our hat to her.

It is of course a common occurrence for two writers to hit on the same subject; they have even been known to hit on almost identical words for an occasional sentence. But we doubt if the following can be beaten in the way of coincidence: In the current issue of the Musical Mirror, under the heading 'School Music,' appears an article signed 'Pedagogue,' dealing with orchestral concerts for children; in the January Monthly Musical Record is an article by Mr. Yorke Bannard entitled 'Children's Orchestral Concerts.' Nothing remarkable in the coincidence, so far, as the subject is very much in the air. But it is remarkable that the two articles are word for word identical. It would be interesting to know who wrote first, 'Pedagogue' or Mr. Bannard.

The daily press has lately broken out into collections of schoolboy 'howlers.' Not many were of a musical nature, but we managed to pin down the following definitions:

Nasal organ = harmonium.
Sotto Voce = in a drunken voice.
Pas de deux = a father of twins.
Fugue = the air in a stuffy room.

The association of 'fugue' with the slang 'fug' is startling at first, but after all aren't there quite a lot of fugues that might be spelt that way?

A reader sends us the following advertisment—an unusually good specimen of what may be called the 'pedigree' type:

MUSICAL TUITION.—Beethoven, Chopin, &c., &c. The true interpretation as taught by Beethoven to Liszt and Liszt to Señor Esposito (Dublin Academy) and Señor Esposito to Rev. A. H. Collisson, M.A., Mus. Doc., and Rev. A. H. Collisson to his pupil and deputy, Rev.———. Groups of six at least taken at 1/- per hour. No kindergarten wanted.

A shilling per hour seems very little for the true interpretation handed down in a direct line from Beethoven. Still, much depends on the amount of loss by evaporation and dilution the stream may have suffered before finally coming to rest with the Rev. ———.

Clergy who give their organists Christmas presents usually fall back on books and music as being safe. The choice is so wide that we find ourselves wondering whether it was by mere accident that an incumbent gave his organist at Christmas, 1923, Mr. Newton's 'Dont's for Organists,' and followed it up a year later with the same writer's 'Dont's for Choirmasters.' The much-repressed organist is probably looking round in vain for a 'Dont's for Parsons.'

'All that we know of Bach,' says Mr. W. J. Turner, 'is that he had three wives.'

This is where we moderns have an advantage over John Sebastian, for it is more than he himself knew.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS

DIPLOMA DISTRIBUTION

The presentation of diplomas took place on January 24, a good attendance of members and friends being present.

The proceedings began with the following announcements by the Hon. Secretary: There were sixty-one candidates for Fellowship, and twelve passed; for the Associateship, a hundred and sixty entered, thirty-three passing. The Fellowship Lafontaine Prize was awarded to Mr. S. D. M. Ashley, of Sutton, Surrey; the Fellowship Turpin Prize was withheld; the Associateship Lafontaine Prize was won by Mr. G. Newell, of Whittlesey, Cambs; and the Associateship Sawyer Prize by Mr. M. G. Taylor, of London.

The distribution of diplomas then took place.

ALAN W. SHINDLER, Registrar.

Mr. H. F. Ellingford played the following pieces from the 1925 syllabus:

Prelude and Fugue in G major ... ... J. S. Bach
Minuet from Sonata No. 1, in F major ... Stanford
Largo Sostenuto from 'A Sea Symphony' R. Vaughan Williams
Adagio in E major ... ...Frank Bridge

After the customary votes of thanks the company adjourned to the Upper Hall, where light refreshments were provided, and an enjoyable réunion took place.

The Reports of the Examining Boards are appended:

FELLOWSHIP ORGAN-WORK

It will be a happy day when organists realise the importance of time and rhythm. There was too often a tendency to pause while change of stops was being made; this was particularly noticeable in the Bach Prelude and Fugue in C. Rhythm is a characteristic of all good playing, and should not be neglected. The note-values in Schumann's Adagio espressivo were almost invariably incorrect in the left hand while accompanying the clarinet melody. Staccato was often exaggerated, at times the pipes had hardly time to speak. Further, it should be remembered that unless pedal passages are coupled to the manual they are indistinct—many candidates failed to realise this. There was not much variety in the registration, though there were often signs of feeling for expression. The use of the Swell pedal was overdone. Sudden gusts would be avoided if more care was used when opening the box. The first inch of movement of the pedal is worth all the rest.

The vocal score-reading was invariably too slow. It would be impossible to sing satisfactorily at the pace chosen. The metronomic indication was ignored. There was a false reading of clefs, and much halting over difficulties, and even a failure to grasp the key before starting. We regret to say that about eighty per cent. of the candidates failed to reach the necessary marks to pass in this vocal score-reading test.

The harmonization of the unfigured bass was on a better level, but the candidates in their haste often omitted to put in a fourth part. One candidate played the whole test entirely in three parts. The sight-reading test was an improvement on previous years. It was often taken too fast, being marked Adagio, and this led to unnecessary complications. The time-values were badly misread. This weakness was found also in the themes given for extemporisation, and actually in the prepared pieces.

Some of the candidates showed invention and imagination in the extemporisation test. It was gratifying that this test had not been neglected, seeing how important it is in an organist's work. There was a certain amount of form and development, and the registration was varied.

W. G. ALCOCK.
EDWARD C. BAIRSTOW.

FELLOWSHIP PAPER-WORK

The working of some papers bore evidence of the possession of sound musicianship on the part of candidates. This was generally noticeable in the free counterpoint test which, on the whole, was well-worked—also in the setting of words as a tenor solo, to which many of the candidates wrote a genuine pianoforte accompaniment and not merely a succession of four-part chords. The work in the other subjects did not however reach so high a level. In the orchestration there was a tendency to use too many instruments simultaneously rather than for purposes of contrast, while the instruments employed were sometimes in excess of those stipulated. The string quartets showed general weakness in 'quartet writing.' Special attention should be drawn to the fact that many candidates have not yet realised that more serious study must be given to the subjects upon which the questions are set. These subjects are now limited both in number and scope, and the questions set must be answered with a reasonable degree of fullness, and in a manner which proves that the subjects have been carefully studied.

P. C. BUCK.
H. W. RICHARDS.

ASSOCIATE ORGAN-WORK

The general improvement in the solo playing, which we remarked on at the last examination, has been maintained. There are, however, still several defects that call for attention. Many candidates showed a lack of grip, especially in rhythm, and gave us the feeling that they were thinking of the piece in sections, and not as a whole. This was specially noticeable in Charles Wood's Prelude and in West's Prelude on 'St. Michael' (e.g., p. 14, line 3, bar 1). Jongen's Cantabile was generally played without imagination or punctuation, otherwise the phrasing showed improvement, though it was sometimes made too obvious, and at the expense of the rhythm. Karg-Elert's Prelude suffered most in this way, generally because candidates failed to realise the quiet, flowing nature of the piece as a whole. The chief defect in the registration was again the indefinite pedal, owing to the absence of 8-ft. tone. It cannot be too strongly urged that candidates must listen to the whole of what they play and not merely to the top part. Charles Wood's Prelude suffered particularly in this respect, notwithstanding the fact that the use of the Swell-to-Pedal coupler was indicated. As an extreme example may be mentioned the candidate who began the first movement of Mendelssohn's fourth Sonata with loud Great uncoupled to Pedal, and remained unconscious of the inaudible bass until near the end. Several candidates started the Bach Fugue with a Claribel on the Great coupled to all the Swell reeds. Loud reeds are more effective when added to Great Diapason tone. Generally speaking, the pace was well chosen, but many erred by playing on the slow side, with a loss of vitality, especially in the Chorale Prelude, 'In Thee is bliss.'

The score-reading and transposition were on the whole well done, though in the latter several candidates forgot that the hymn-tune must be played rhythmically, so that a congregation could sing to it.

In the sight-reading test there were some bad mistakes in the modulations. In several cases the test was played much too loudly, and became an organ solo instead of an accompaniment. The uncoupled pedal was again prevalent, and the pedal part was occasionally played an octave lower than written.

ASSOCIATE PAPER-WORK

Strict Counterpoint.—Good on the whole. There was a tendency to get a wide gap for too long a period between the soprano and alto parts.

Free Counterpoint.—This was generally well done. The join from the given opening to the next bar seemed to cause some difficulty.

Pianoforte Accompaniment to Melody.—The Examiners were agreeably surprised to find so much imagination and ingenuity. There were many very good workings.

Addition of Melody to Bass.—The general standard was quite good, several excellent workings being sent up.

Addition of Bass to Melody.—Not so good; but there were several notable exceptions. Candidates should be more careful about their barring.

Harmonization of Melody.—Much the weakest part of the examination. There were few really artistic workings. The standard in this section seems to have deteriorated.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS

THE ORGANIST—CITIZEN AND ARTIST

At these gatherings it has been the custom for the President to give a short address which will be of some interest to the musician, and a means of stimulating thought. Let us, first of all, take a cursory glance at the world, and the influence which our environment has upon us. The distractions and flurry of the present time can hardly be looked upon as an inspiration to the creative artist, whatever they may be to the interpretative. In either case, if the student aspires to be an artist he must always strive for the beautiful, for beauty and true art, I contend, are synonymous terms. When the word beauty is used people may, and will, differ as to what is actually meant. Sir Hubert Parry points this out very clearly when he says:

> 'By beauty some people mean sensuous beauty pure and simple, others mean the beauty of things which are only apprehended by the mind and temperamental instincts . . . early choral music was characterized by simple sensuous beauty, by beauty of actual sound, beauty of contour of melody, beauty of simple design [then later he continues:] A great deal of Bach's music cannot be called sensuously beautiful, and yet its quality of beauty is far more appealing than the most agreeable works of the greatest Italian Masters.'

Broadly speaking, we may assume that some of the canons of beauty are: symmetry, shape, proportion, tone, and colour, for we can never admit anything which is ill-proportioned or hideous. The student, in leading his artistic life, will need two essentials, leisure and periods of solitude, if his imagination is to have free play and his brain opportunities to concentrate. Unfortunately these are almost impossible in our artificial existence. The mind becomes distracted by the hustle and bustle of modern life, by the snare for amusement and change, or even by money making—the latter up to a point being forced upon the professional man by heavy taxation, and perhaps by his desire to emulate the profiteer in ease and luxury. There can be no doubt that many of us are tainted with such aspirations, and it is a matter of some difficulty to shake oneself free from the vain ambitions of life. We must undoubtedly be as good citizens as others, but the tyranny of expense incurred in living merely up to the standard of our self-respect, in providing for illness and for the infirmities of old age, is enough to absorb most of our powers, and to stifle most of the finer susceptibilities of our nature. The serious student has to fight a battle within himself if he is to triumph over circumstances, and detach himself from sordid aims. In doing so, and conquering, he will free his artistic impulses to grow and fulfil their highest functions. The germ of art exists within us all in varying degrees, and if this germ is cultivated and encouraged to thrive, our vision will, in proportion, increase in its perception of real beauty. A man's art should provide the outlet for most of his mental energies, and conscript, as it were, his whole being. Above all, it is essential for him to have an ideal, and, however high the ideal, it need not be unattainable if he is sincere and persistently considers its attainment as vital. Let him never persuade himself that living up to a high ideal is easy. On the contrary, however gifted, he will find that it needs constant effort and application, coupled with an ever widening vision. Among other things, a common pitfall must at all costs be shunned. I mean superficiality. The musician who grasps this fact, who is determined to lay his foundations deep, and who has the real spark in him, can, by study, fan this spark into a steady flame. He will then for the first time experience a joy in life which is only dreamed of and talked about by others. The fascination of music is at least as great as that of the other arts, but since she is the youngest, and at the moment in a state of transition, it is impossible to say what new beauties she may develop, what entrancing discoveries may yet transpire in the world of sound. William Wallace, in his 'Threshold of Music,' comparing music with the other arts, says:

> 'Music can boast of no past like architecture, no ancestry like sculpture or painting. The secrets of these are, broadly speaking revealed to the world, for while from time to time bright geniuses have arisen who have stamped their individuality upon their work, the style and form were there before them, and the spirit of a thousand years is visible in the modern examples of sculpture, while the great Masters in painting had become classics at a time when music was quite in its infancy.'

Bearing in mind, then, that music is a growing art—for, as we know it, it goes back only about three hundred years—we should be wise never to sneer at fresh ideas, but to keep our minds open to new impressions. Our views will be sounder, and our judgment less warped, if we have been trained in good traditions, and understand the message of the works of past generations. A more intimate knowledge of the history of music should bring greater toleration and wider appreciation. In all our criticisms humility and charity must be blended, for out of the confusion of the present a genuine new phase of art may yet come into existence and live. Provided that we are serious and scorn to be mere dabblers, no warning will be necessary against the meretricious or the vulgar, for both will be as objectionable to the honest student as the poseur who advertises himself as a great virtuoso by affectation in manner or oddness in dress and coiffure. Such humbug, however, can have no effect on the examiners of this College, for, happily, they are behind a screen and are oblivious to all mannerisms. There are others even more insidious, who from fashion or because they wish to be considered artistic, encourage mawkish sentimentality in music, or patronise and admire the 'intense,' being unaware that such superficialities have no place in genuine art. They applaud the 'sob' in singing, excessive rubato and gush in expression, which they call temperament. Such are a few of the characteristics of this particular 'School'! Our musical sense needs to be well balanced to distinguish between eccentricity and genius, and to differentiate between the plausible and the true. Genuine art goes deep, and music especially makes great demands on our mental powers because it is so complex and intangible. I have, so far, touched upon some of the drawbacks to the artistic life of our environment and the encroachments of materialism. Parry truly says:

> 'Materialism is merely the preference for the lower pleasures of sense rather than for the higher pleasures of thought.'

We can, however, mention a few compensations which were denied to our forefathers. For instance, at almost any time we can hear the greatest performances of the best music, and by the best music I mean that which has stood the test of time and withstood all criticism. Short of taking a personal part ourselves, there can be no sounder education than listening to the great artists of the day, presupposing that our ear and our æsthetic sense are sufficiently cultivated to appreciate in some degree the beauty of their interpretation. Varieties of touch, gradation of tone, strength, delicacy, grace, lucid presentation of thought in the performances of a real artist inevitably make a vital addition to the experience of those who listen and can profit. Again, those students who enjoy the advantage of studying at one of our great schools of music can continually hear the classics performed and discussed, and live in a musical atmosphere which permeates their whole being. Such privileges as these ought to deter anyone from being enticed away by the attractive and tawdry, or distracted by the ignoble. The organist usually occupies a leading position in his own district, and as a public performer he cannot shirk the responsibility which rests upon him, for he is educating his hearers, and either elevating or lowering their standards. It is therefore incumbent upon him to stand by the great principles of his art, and to take a genuine delight in things beautiful. Surely there can be no hardship in asking anyone to work hard at a Fugue of Bach, for the study of a great work should be not only a discipline but a delight, and, as Dr. Buck says in his 'Scope of Music'—'The better the understanding the greater the appreciation.' I have not dwelt on the necessity of candidates possessing a clear and secure technique because, apart from the faults inseparable from imperfect finger work, I know the examiners will support me when I say that lack of musicianship is the chief cause of most failures. They wait patiently and anxiously for an intelligent interpretation, and are only too eager to give full credit to any artistic touch, however slight. Musical fancy, detail, attack, climax, rhythm, colour, shading, clearness of outline and texture, and so forth, are never lost on them. My contention reduces itself to this—that most candidates do not take their work seriously enough, and are not only partially equipped but deficient in artistic sensibility. This is a grave statement, but I fear it is true. A man will never become an artist without vast patience and persistent study. He must practise his art for its own sake, and not merely to 'struggle through' these examinations, desirable and important in his career though they may be. I have spoken of the artistic side of our work in the hope that some at any rate will take these few words to heart and raise their artistic aims and conceptions. The Fellows and Associates of this College should be conspicuous by their valuable diplomas, of course, but much more by the beauty pervading their whole work.

A CANADIAN CATHEDRAL ORGANIST ON HIS R.C.O. EXPERIENCES

The Diapason for December contained a very interesting article by Dr. Alfred E. Whitehead, of Christ Church Cathedral, Montreal, describing his experiences when sitting for the F.R.C.O. diploma last summer. (It may be remembered that he sat to some purpose, being one of the microscopic group of four successful candidates out of sixty-four, and winner of the Lafontaine prize.) Dr. Whitehead has some pertinent things to say on the examination, and we think they will interest the College officials and members. The new type of question in the paper evidently appealed to him—as indeed we believe it will to the majority of candidates in course of time. Dr. Whitehead remarks of the orchestration test that it 'worked beautifully, and was a real pleasure to do. . . . The passage, written for the occasion, I believe [it was], was charming music, eminently suitable for the purpose, and the whole question was a delight.' He found, too, that the 'outline' of the string quartet work (one of the new departures) was 'suggestive,' and 'made for a musical result.' He warmly approves of the 'free counterpoint' question, which took the form of a melody to be harmonized for organ, in the style of a specimen bar. 'It was a good question,' he says, 'calling for some taste and mastery of style.'

In regard to the ear-tests he makes a criticism that the examiners will no doubt bear in mind. He found the first one—a series of chords—easy, but the second he was unable to finish. It consisted of a four-bar passage in two-part harmony, the parts being melodic. He seems to ascribe his failure to the fact that 'it was played in a manner as nearly as possible devoid of accent,' and was 'a most confusing, flabby, spineless thing to listen to.' He is sure that 'had a student played it in the same inane manner,' the examiner would have criticised him severely. But the examiner may fairly retort that perhaps Dr. Whitehead had considerably underrated the difficulty of this task.

Dr. Whitehead confesses that he was 'terribly nervous' when he came up for the playing tests. He found, however, that > '. . . the attendant at the organ, whose duties were to place the several test-pieces upon the music desk, and to turn the pages—not to assist in registration—was gentlemanly and considerate in the extreme, and his quiet, unobtrusive movements helped materially to lessen the nervous strain.'

We believe examinees in general will agree that so far as courtesy and consideration can temper the rigour of the examination, they are invariably forthcoming from all at the College.

Dr. Whitehead adversely criticises the selection of test-pieces, 'all by dead Germans,' as W. T. Best used to say. He thinks that the list of such an important examination should include at least one English work—always, not occasionally, as at present. He goes on:

> 'And there should be no organ arrangement. I feel strongly about this. About ten years ago I wrote for The Diapason an article rather pretentiously styled "The Ethics of Transcribing," in which I lauded the organ arangement. I have changed my views since then, and some day may present a very different case to your readers. Franck, Widor, Vierne, Jongen, Bach, Rheinberger, Reger, Karg-Elert, the Englishmen I have already named [Bairstow, Howells, Harwood, Stanford, &c.], and some promising Americans have made it unnecessary to look to orchestral or pianoforte literature for organ material, except on rare occasions. The organ arrangement has become a curse, and I think England has been largely to blame in this respect; she has certainly contributed most to the literature of organ arrangements. I thought I noticed signs during the summer that many of the younger generation of organists are turning away from the arrangement and are playing more Bach, Franck, &c. I trust that the movement will grow, and that we shall hear less of the "1812" Overture, the "Magic Fire" Music, and the "William Tell" on our noble instrument.'

Here we think Dr. Whitehead is right. If the Council still consider a transcription is worth including in the syllabus, the test might be made more useful and artistic if competitors were required to make their own arrangement of a given work. But we believe the weight of opinion amongst members would be in favour of dropping it entirely. The room thus made for one more organ-piece could be so used that in a short time the repertory of organists throughout the country would be greatly benefited. The three pieces might, for example, be (a) a Bach work, (b) a piece by a British composer, and (c) a work by a standard foreign composer, generally modern. Who can doubt that the effect on playing and choice of music would be beneficial? It might even give a stimulus to serious organ composition, which at present is among the least practised of all branches of creative art—not because of a lack of composers, but because the market is too small to make the line attractive to publishers.

Dr. Whitehead concludes an attractively-written article by a warm tribute to the playing of Dr. Darke at the Diploma presentation, and expresses the view that Americans would welcome an opportunity of hearing such players as Alcock, Bairstow, Cunningham, Ley, and Darke. We hope they will have their chance. At present England is importing a vast amount of organ playing, and exporting little or none. Why?

BATTERSEA POLYTECHNIC

The organ at this institution has recently been rebuilt. The original instrument was by Messrs. Beale & Thynne, and was presented by Sir Henry Tate. It has now been enlarged and brought up to present-day standards by Messrs. Hill & Son and Norman & Beard. Following is the specification:

The re-opening took place on December 11, when Dr. H. Davan Wetton, head of the Music Department, gave a recital, assisted by Dr. W. Herbert Hickox, their joint programme including the 'St. Anne' Fugue, Rheinberger's eleventh Sonata, Wetton's March in A flat and Andantino in D flat, &c.

The 1924-25 calendar of classes held at the Polytechnic shows that music holds a very prominent position. Dr. Wetton has a fine staff, and the classes include preparation for the Inter. and Final Mus. Bac. (London), Sight-Singing, Class-Singing, Aural Training, &c., for L.R.A.M. and and A.R.C.M., besides the usual facilities for vocal and instrumental solo work. There are also choral and orchestral societies, and—most important of all—a very large number of students making the most of the opportunities put in their way.

A carol service of unusual type took place at Peterborough Cathedral on December 29, when thirty-five choirs of all denominations, numbering nearly a thousand voices, united in a programme that included Geoffrey Shaw's 'Worship,' Parry's Jerusalem,' and well-known hymns and carols, interspersed with organ music by Handel, John E. West, &c. Dr. H. Coleman, who organized the service, conducted.

We are glad to hear that the governing body of Battersea Polytechnic is arranging for recitals to be given on the reconstructed 'Tate' organ in the Great Hall. The first series begins on February 4, when Dr. W. G. Alcock will play. He will be followed by Dr. H. G. Ley (February 11) and Mr. G. D. Cunningham (February 18). The recitals are at 8 o'clock, and admission costs sixpence and (reserved seat) one shilling.

Modern organ music is having a good show lately at St. Clement Danes, where the voluntaries played by Mr. D. Rayner-Smith during January included Paul de Maleingreau's 'Musicale Offrande' and 'Angelus ad Pastores,' Howells's Three Psalm-Preludes, Honegger's Choral, the Finale from Vierne's second Symphony, and the first two movements from Widor's Sixth. Contrast was provided by seven of Bach's Chorale Preludes.

The spring concert of the London Sunday School Choir will take place at the Albert Hall on February 14, at 6.30. The programme will include Mendelssohn's 'Forty-second Psalm,' Bach's 'My soul, O praise the Lord,' selections from 'Elijah,' Handel's 'L'Allegro,' 'Tannhäuser,' &c., &c. The soloists will be Miss Florence Austral, Mr. Walter Hyde, and Mr. Allan Brown. Mr. W. H. Scott and Mr. Wesley Hammet will conduct.

Mr. Thalben Ball will give a recital at St. James's Church of Scotland, Goose Green, East Dulwich, on February 9, at 8. The programme will include Bach's Prelude and Fugue in A minor, the Finale of Vierne's first Symphony, Dupré's Fugue in G minor, Lemare's Variations on 'Hanover,' and the Finale of the Reubke Sonata. Mr. E. J. Janes will sing Dvorák's Biblical Songs and Stanford's 'Song of Battle.'

We have received an interesting letter and batch of programmes from Dr. J. C. Bradshaw, organist of Christchurch Cathedral, New Zealand. The Doctor's old friends at home will be glad to hear that he has a fine new organ on the way. The instrument is being built by Messrs. Hill & Son and Norman & Beard, and will contain about seventy stops.

The organ in St. Gregory's, Cheltenham, has recently been enlarged and rebuilt by Messrs. Blackett & Howden, of Newcastle, and is now a three-manual of twenty-eight stops. Mr. Frederick Dalrymple gave the opening recital, playing a Handel Concerto, Bach's 'Great' G minor Fugue, the Reubke Fugue, the Finale from Vierne's third Symphony, &c.

The City Temple Choral Society will sing 'The Creation' on February 14 at 3, conducted by Mr. Allan Brown, with Mr. G. D. Cunningham at the organ. The Society sang carols and other seasonable music on December 21, when a collection of fifty pounds was taken for St. Dunstan's.

The organ at Chigwell Parish Church has been renovated and cleaned. It is worth recording that the cost (£176) was raised in ten days by Mr. E. C. Finch, the hon. secretary of the fund—a feat that will make many a poor parish wish Mr. Finch would migrate thither from Chigwell.

Dr. Caradoc Roberts opened a new organ in the Wesleyan Church, Cudworth, on January 15. The instrument is a two-manual of thirteen stops, and was built by Keates, of Sheffield.

Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper have recently built for the Dutch Reformed Church, De Aar, Orange Free State, a two-manual organ of thirteen stops.

A new organ of two manuals and sixteen stops has just been erected in Abergele Parish Church by Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper.

Mr. Teasdale Griffiths, choirmaster and organist, St. Stephen's, Prenton, Birkenhead; and conductor of Birkenhead Musical and Operatic Society.

Mr. Glanvill Hopkins, choirmaster and organist, St. Andrew's, Holborn.

Mr. Herbert Hodge has been appointed organist to the Great Priory of Malta for the twenty-first year in succession.

Mr. Norman A. Sayers, choirmaster and organist, Presbyterian Church, Putney.

Mr. A. W. Standidge, choirmaster and organist, All Souls', Eastbourne.

Mr. A. Watts, choirmaster and organist, Cemetery Road Baptist Church, Sheffield.

Correction.—In our January issue we announced that Mr. M. Courtenay Boyle had been appointed conductor of Windsor and Eton Choral and Orchestral Society. This was a slip. The name of the organization should have been the Windsor and Eton Amateur Orchestral Society. Both these Societies, by the way, were founded by Sir Walter Parratt, and join forces on occasion. The former is conducted by the Rev. Bernard Everett, who succeeded Sir Walter a good many years ago.

Letters to the Editor

NOTATION OF THE HORN: SOME ALTERED MEANINGS

Sir,—If additional proof were required to show that there is ambiguity attached to 'bouché,' 'cuivré,' and the +, the letters of Messrs. Blandford and Pegge would seem to furnish it. As regards 'cuivré,' I pointed out that, while Berlioz gave it as an effect primarily on open notes, Widor has it as one which is used invariably on closed ones. Mr. Pegge confronts me with the second edition of Widor's treatise, of the same date as the first (1904), in which it is admitted that players can 'brass' fortissimo passages (why only ff ones?) without the aid of the hand. That is, Widor not only alters Berlioz's meaning, but in the space of a few months alters—or, at any rate, modifies—his own. What happens in the new edition of 1920 we are not told.

Mr. Blandford wonders why I do not quote Widor's 'final directions,' which he twists from their obvious meaning. The section is headed 'Three Colourings,' and explains that, in addition to the ordinary horn tone, there are two special colourings—the Son Bouché produced by means of the mute, and the Son Cuivré by means of the hand in the bell. After some examples of the first, Widor gives three ways of indicating what he calls 'cuivré,' the third of which being the cross (+) and the word 'cuivré' combined. The section concludes:

> 'En résumé pour éviter tout malentendu, il faut dorénavant s'en tenir à ces deux formules:
> 'Con Sordini pour toutes les sonorités pianissimo.
> 'Cuivré (surmonté d'une croix +) pour les autres.'

The French musician is not recording present practice, but merely hinting to composers that 'to avoid misunderstanding' the best methods of indicating his two special colourings are, Con Sordini for the sounds that he calls 'bouché,' and for his 'cuivré' the third way he has given, viz., the word 'cuivré' and the + combined. Mr. Blandford reads so much between the lines that he makes Widor stultify himself by implying a fourth colouring, the 'cuivré' on open notes. But surely it is extremely unlikely that anyone would commence a section by insisting on three colourings, and three only, and then conclude by slily suggesting a fourth? The fourth colouring seems only to have occurred to Widor in a second edition.

It will be observed that, while Widor's 'bouché' requires the use of the mute, Mr. Pegge obtains his by the help of the hand: and that, while Widor prefers a cross for his 'cuivré,' Mr. Pegge reserves the sign for his 'bouché.' Yet your correspondent professes to be mystified by my article, and fails to see that there is any ambiguity in regard to these terms! I sympathise with Pizzetti, who cries 'A plague on both your houses,' and in 'Dèbora e Jaéle' (1922) adopts a nice new sign to connote closed notes—the sign of the down-stroke on the violin (⌐), with the same sign up-side-down to contradict it.

Mr. Blandford is inclined to dismiss airily the 'kind Italians,' who he presumes—I do not know with what reason—have copied Widor. He does not account for Mr. Forsyth (whose kindness I would not question, but of whose Italian origin I am dubious), who, in his admirable 'Orchestration,' says precisely the same thing. On p. 58, he mentions the 'cuivré' in Bizet's 'L'Arlésienne,' referring the reader to p. 113 for an explanation of the term. There we learn that these 'cuivré' notes, which vary from 'a savage bark like that of a wild animal to the dull uncertain sound with which a rout-seat scrapes over a parquet floor,' are connoted by cuivré, by sons bouchés, by ff, by +, by Schmetternd or stark anblasen, or by a combination of two or more of them. And they are always stopped notes! Mr. Pegge calls Giordano's translation of Bizet's 'Cuivrez' as 'chiuso' a blunder. Well, it is apparently a blunder shared by Forsyth!

Because, in one particular, I said that 'the mechanical part does not concern us,' Mr. Pegge takes my remark in a general sense. It is a little unkind! But I do not complain, since it induces him to explain the modern Parisian methods of obtaining the various colourings. I should be grateful if he would explain an observation in Gilson's 'Le Tutti Orchestral' (1913). The latter quotes thirteen bars from 'Tristan' (pp. 751-2), in which occurs this passage for the horns:

The +, he explains, signifies a 'bouché' note. He then continues 'A Paris, les cornistes interprètent ce signe comme un son à la fois bouché et renforcé—sf—ce qui est erroné.' Why should the Paris horn-players place an unmarked sf on the weakest beat of the bar? Has it anything to do with their one method of stopping, or do they imagine that the + connotes an accented note?

Mr. Blandford asks me to give 'one example from any French composition, in which 'cuivré' alone, without any indication, expressed or implied, of hand-stopping, means that a closed note is to be forced.' It is a curious request, for not only is it often difficult to appreciate the composer's meaning, but it is quite impossible to tell, from the inspection of a score, how a particular note will be played by a particular performer in England, France, or Italy. In the 'bouché' phrase I gave from the 'Capriccio Espagnol,' Rimsky-Korsakov certainly marked a p, and there are strong reasons for supposing that in 1887 he intended the notes to be only half stopped. Mr. Pegge informs us that at Paris the phrase is played mf, and fully stopped. No one could possibly gather this from a mere inspection of the score! Mr. Blandford observes rightly that it is 'a writer's duty to record existing practice,' and, though he accuses the 'kind Italians,' and indirectly Mr. Forsyth, of slavishly following Widor, it does not follow that they have done so. I would rather give them credit for having founded their ideas on such existing practice as came within their ken. On one point at least, in connection with the horn, we know that Widor consulted M. Pénable, 'Soliste des Concerts Colonne.' He possibly consulted him on other points.

By evoking the shade of Hans Richter, Mr. Blandford seeks to demolish my surely not unreasonable contention that a 'closed note' is not the same as a 'closed note forcibly blown (stark anzublasen).' In 'The Mastersingers' we find a trumpet mit Dämpfer und sehr stark geblasen to imitate the comic tone of a toy instrument. As the part is merely marked 'f marc.,' the sehr stark (very forcibly) obviously does not refer to any dynamic strength, but to some special method of producing the notes, resembling, if not identical with the 'cuivré.' This is partly proved by the fact that the six horns on the stage in 'Tristan,' undoubtedly intended to represent the French hunting-horns (Trompes de chasse), from which the 'cuivré' tone is derived, are directed to be played 'sehr stark.' In 'Siegfried' (p. 359), three trumpets and a bass one (all muted) are marked 'stark anzublasen.' Unless the indication is absolutely meaningless, a trumpet mit Dämpfer (muted) and one mit Dämpfer und stark geblasen are not one and the same thing. In the same way, a horn merely gestopft, and one gestopft und stark geblasen are not the same.

I have no difficulty in believing the probable fact that Richter treated all Wagner's closed notes in the same way. But what of it? It merely proves that he had his own ideas, and carried them out consistently. As an expert horn-player, he had a mild contempt for Wagner's method of writing for an instrument 'he never completely understood,' and it must be remembered that the layman composer, as pioneer of valve-horn writing in the orchestra, had a very difficult task. But Richter realised Wagner's aims, and endeavoured faithfully to translate them into genuine horn language, without tying himself down to the varying directions of the composer. What he did was to standardise the ideas that Wagner had been trying to evolve painfully for twenty-five years, and in doing so he displayed no disloyalty.

In the score of 'The Valkyrie,' for the Ride a Rührtrommel—Wagner's name for the snareless tenor drum—is marked. At his concerts Richter always employed the ordinary snare drum, with the result that Prout and other eminent musicians, blindly trusting in Richter, imagined that the Rührtrommel was the snare drum. In 'Siegfried' Wagner particularly requests throughout 'The Ring' an 'alto oboe' in place of the ordinary cor anglais. Richter ignored Wagner's request and employed the latter instrument. For the bass trumpet Richter used an alto trombone, a good substitute no doubt, but not what Wagner wanted, and I do not think that anyone can remember six harps in any of the Richter extracts from 'The Ring.' The celebrated conductor gave us the spirit of the Master's works, but he certainly did not slavishly follow the letter as regards horns or anything else. 'Tristan,' I would add, was composed, published, and performed before Richter, as a young man of twenty-three, ever met Wagner. And, so far as I know, he never conducted it in the composer's presence.

Regretting that ill-health prevented my replying to my critics before.—Yours, &c.,

TOM S. WOTTON.

[In order to save time we sent copies of Mr. Wotton's letter to Messrs. W. F. H. Blandford and Morley Pegge. Their replies are subjoined.—ED.]

SIR,—Mr. Wotton replies to the letter of Mr. Pegge and myself by saying that if additional proof were required to show that there is ambiguity attached to the meanings of 'cuivré,' &c., these letters furnish it. But no attempt has been made to disprove a fact of which Mr. Wotton gives instances. The original point at issue, as I understand it, was that 'cuivré' has changed its meaning; and this implies the general discarding of the old, and adoption of the new, meaning. These letters sought to show that no such change of meaning has ever been present in the minds of players, and that the ambiguity of which Mr. Wotton complains is the result of imperfect appreciation of technical terms on the part of a few writers.

For this Widor seems to have been mainly responsible, and the fact that he modified his statements in his second edition is of great significance. In other respects he is not altogether a sound or accurate guide to horn practice, though that does not immediately concern us.

My reason for not attaching importance to the Italian phraseology is that one should look to French sources alone for the explanation of a French musical term. No doubt Mr. Wotton knows the saying 'Traduttore, traditore,' and appreciates that musical terms are liable to suffer in exportation and translation.

As regards Forsyth's 'Orchestration,' I regret that I do not share Mr. Wotton's confidence in interpreting the author's views and, knowing how and whence he obtained his knowledge of horn technicalities, am satisfied that he never learnt from the source in question that 'cuivré' and 'bouche' were synonymous.

Everyone can form his own estimate of the value to attach to Richter's interpretation of Wagner's horn parts. It is hardly just to invoke in argument his non-employment of six harps, the semi-mythical bass-trumpet, or even the Rührtrommel in concert performances; these omissions may obviously have been dictated by considerations of economy and the need of utilising available material, which have no bearing on the right or wrong use of the instruments actually employed by him. It is perhaps worth while mentioning that Richter, while most particular about the effects produced by his horns, allowed his players a wide latitude in the means of production. He did not mind what crook they used, whether they played hand or valve notes, or how they muted, provided that the result sounded right. This was as it should be, because there is often great disparity of method between performers of equal competence.

Mr. Wotton mentions that Wagner required an 'alto aboe' throughout the 'Ring' in place of the cor anglais. It would be interesting if he would tell us precisely what Wagner had in his mind. According to Dr. Curt Sachs, one of the chief modern authorities on musical instruments, the 'Altoboe' was merely the earlier form which in the second half of the 18th century was slightly modified by the adoption of the pear-shaped bell borrowed from the oboe d'amour to become the cor anglais ('Handbuch der Musikinstrumentenkunde,' pp. 317-18.) If this is what Wagner wanted, he was asking for something that would have had to be specially constructed, and even then would probably have ill represented the early 18th century instrument in character.—Yours, &c.,

W. F. H. BLANDFORD.

SIR,—Mr. Wotton has returned gallantly to the charge. Your correspondent points out that Berlioz gives 'cuivré' as an effect primarily on open notes, while Widor would almost confine it to stopped notes. Why the one or the other, since open, stopped, and muted notes can all be played cuivré if desired? If 'cuivré' or 'brassed' are to be considered to mean merely 'stopped' in ff passages and 'with mute' in pp passages, how are we to mark the parts when we want open notes brassed, stopped notes not brassed, and muted notes brassed ff or not brassed pp? The timbre is quite different in each case. Is it not safer to assume that 'cuivré' means what it says, and implies neither stopping nor muting, that the indication 'bouché' or 'stopped' means 'close the bell with the hand,' and that 'with a mute' means with a mute, and let the expression marks do the rest? This would appear both logical and simple, and seems to be the current practice with post-Wagner composers. Many of the standard works on orchestration were written during the transition period from natural- to valve-horn, and the technique of stopping is quite different for the two instruments.

I must really ask Mr. Wotton whether he has ever heard the passage in Bizet's 'Carillon' played 'stopped,' and if so whether he liked it! Had Bizet required 'stopped' notes he would have written for horns in E flat with appropriate instructions at the beginning. Here we have hand-horns on which it is impossible to 'stop' the passage with the E crook.

I regret that during my experience in professional orchestras of all kinds at Paris since 1912 I have never heard of M. Gilson, nor have I ever met a player who read sfz + unless directed to do so by >. We live and learn.

Your correspondent reminds me that Widor consulted M. Pénable, so may I, in spite of being a professional myself, 'et à mes risques et périls,' remind him of Mr. Corder's words of wisdom when, in his admirable handbook on orchestration, he warns composers to be very chary of consulting the professional horn-player about his instrument.

The fact is that horn technique is so elastic that every player has his own methods; but so long as the composer's intentions are adequately conveyed to the audience the means may safely be left to the player's discretion. A case in point occurs in Brahms's second Symphony. The difficult solo for horn in B is unplayable as it stands, and no player could be induced to attempt it in public on anything but the F or E crook. No doubt Pénable, for reasons best known to himself, elected to close the bell very slightly to obtain the cuivré effect, and Widor, unfamiliar with the complexities of horn technique, assumed that it was necessary to play such notes stopped—which proves the wisdom of Mr. Corder's remarks.

Richter's use of the cor anglais and alto-trombone for the alto-oboe and the bass trumpet was no doubt dictated by policy. The two latter instruments are freaks, having to be specially made and requiring special study by players who are only called upon to play them perhaps twice or three times a year. In the case of the cor anglais and trombone, instruments and competent players can be found anywhere, thus obviating specially built instruments and enhanced fees, two quite important considerations. How often do we see genuine Wagner tubas used? When we can't get good butter we must do with margarine, and after all good margarine is preferable to bad butter!—Yours, &c.,

SIR HUBERT PARRY

SIR,—Among the many eminent contributors to the columns of the Musical Times, I do not know one who excels Mr. Alexander Brent-Smith, either in choice of subject or the felicitous manner in which his thoughts are expressed, and his article on Sir Hubert Parry is no exception to the rule. Having been a reader of the Musical Times for over sixty years, never during that long period, have I known it to occupy such an important position in the world of music as it does to-day, not only by the valuable information it disseminates, but for the intellectual thought it embodies, creating an atmosphere of refinement and pleasure, and thus becoming an educational factor of very great importance.

I thank Mr. Brent-Smith for his contribution on Sir Hubert Parry, a composer of whom England is proud, whose music will give delight to countless generations yet unborn, and whose memory remains as an abiding benediction.—Yours, &c.,

The Old Manor, WILLIAM MASON.

BYRD'S 'GREAT' SERVICE

SIR,—Referring to the recent performance of the above at St. Margaret's, Westminster, by the Newcastle Choir, your contributor asks, 'What is to be the future of this great music?' and goes on to suggest that the provincial festivals, may be induced to take it up. I would like to emphasise the suggestion, and to express the hope that it may find a place in the Three Choirs programme at Gloucester next September. What an environment these grand old West-country Cathedrals would make for this magnificent music. There is certainly room for a little more elasticity in the Three Choir programmes, and the inclusion of Byrd's masterpiece this year would give untold pleasure to thousands of patrons, whose disappointment will be equally keen if it is excluded, to the retention of works which, however time-honoured, could certainly be spared for one year.—Yours, &c., W. BEAVAN.

'NEW' MUSIC

SIR,—Ever since last Monday (January 12) I have been looking in the local Press to see if anyone took note of the practical joke played upon the unsuspecting Scottish Orchestra in Usher Hall by some nefarious scoundrel.

They were playing a 'New' Concerto by Vittorio Rieti for solo wind and strings—at least that was the name on the programme, whatever they were really doing, for some musical wag had, apparently, mixed up their band parts. One could hear quite a nice two bars of melody which suddenly would be interrupted by a phrase which had no connection with it either textually or harmonically. Several times, for example, when the French horn was playing some flute or clarinet solo a trumpet on the left wing would make it plain that honours were meant to go round like a Bailieship (Aldermanship) in the Town Council.

Each player, however, stuck to his bit with a watchful eye on the conductor (Vaclav Talich), so that at all events they might all stop together, and of course the conductor never gave the show away.

At the close there was great applause, but whether as a tribute to the pluck of the band or for relief that the piece was finished I hardly know. Anyway, every one was pleased, for it was proved that the Scottish Orchestra will stick at nothing now. There is no knotty problem to which they cannot prove a 'Casse-Noisette.' Further, the audience had heard some 'new' music, which bore no resemblance to the effusions of old-fashioned composers like Wagner, Berlioz, and Brahms, not to mention such prehistoric ones as Beethoven, Haydn, and Mozart, whose names are even yet mentioned in encyclopædias.—Yours, &c., GERALD W. CRAWFORD.

CONTEMPORARY COMPOSERS.

SIR,—I should like to point out that my 'Dance of the Two Fairies,' quoted and referred to at some length by 'Feste' in his 'Ad Libitum' notes in your January issue, is the first of my 'Two Little Welsh Dances,' which are just easy five- and six-note pieces for children. That is why 'from start to finish we have nothing but single notes or bare fifths' in the first of the two 'compositions.' The modal melody of the 'Dance of the Two Fairies' is based directly upon one of the oldest Welsh folk-dances known; and the repetition of the first theme (played by the left hand) a fifth higher (played by the right hand) is a characteristic of the old dance. I am sorry if the 'piece' to 'Feste' 'merely suggests the feebler antics of the young French school, with a glance at the Stravinsky of "Les Cinq Doigts," because such a statement means that 'Feste' is completely ignorant of Welsh folk-song, which I suppose he will admit is older than 'the young French school' or the Stravinsky of 'Les Cinq Doigts.' It seems to me something of a joke that this little 'piece' of mine, which is but a five-finger exercise written in the form of a Welsh dance, should be made the basis of a seemingly erudite 'discussion' on the 'monotony,' 'conventionality,' 'ugliness,' and 'futility' of contemporary music!

As one whom your contributor terms 'one of the leaders of the Welsh Nationalist party,' I feel it my duty to point out that he is quite wrong in his suggestion that it is the 'scheme' of the Welsh Nationalist musicians to 'self-isolate' themselves. The 'leaders of the Welsh Nationalist party' are musicians who are eager to introduce the most representative of the music of all countries into Wales, especially the music of those countries which is likely to encourage a Welsh natural utterance; and abundant proof can be given of this. They are musicians, however, who realise that if Wales is to have Welsh music of international significance a hundred years hence Welsh composers must be given to-day opportunities in Wales for developing their art. It was undoubtedly the conditions in Germany some three or four hundred years ago that made possible the great German school of composers; and every British musician, whether he be English, Irish, Scotch, or Welsh, is a fool if he does not realise the fact. I fear the boot of 'self-isolation' is on the wrong foot, otherwise 'Feste' would know a little more of the true position of things in Wales.—Yours, &c.,

W. T. GWYNN WILLIAMS.

SIR,—It was with great pleasure that I read the remarks of 'Feste' in the January number of the Musical Times on the subject of the so-called 'advanced' type of music, which is much supported by a certain section of the musical community, and a large number of the press critics of to-day. There is nothing in the article with which I do not heartily agree, and the opinions expressed therein are only those of many musicians, even if they do not take the trouble, and perhaps cannot afford the time, to write to the papers to express them. I am by no means a reactionary, and am perfectly well aware of the fact that art cannot stand still, and that the harmonic system as it stood, say, thirty or forty years ago, is capable of development, but I maintain that the present craze for originality at all costs, even if ugliness be the result, will in the long run, if persisted in, kill the art of composition altogether. The public is long-suffering, and when it has become tired (and there are signs that it is beginning to be so) of listening to orchestras crashing and banging out fiendish discords without any relief, consecutive fifths galore without rhyme or reason, passages written in two or more different keys simultaneously, &c., &c., it will refuse to patronise music of this kind, and will fall back on the classics. Anyone can make an unpleasant noise with a large modern orchestra, but music is a divine art, and if beauty of form and melody are to be eliminated in the future, then I, for one, will cease to take any interest whatever in modern works, for I cannot stand the hideous noises, which, more often than not, are inflicted on my ears. A short time ago, I went to London to hear the first performance of what was advertised as 'an important new work' by one of the composers of the day. I started off in the great hope of being present at the birth of a masterpiece. I was in the right mood to enjoy it, if I possibly could, especially as it was by a Britisher, for I am frightfully keen on British music being recognised and appreciated. What was the result? To my ears, and I have heard a good deal in my time, it was pandemonium let loose. I sat out one long movement and half the next, then bolted, for I could stand no more. I caught an early train home, greatly disappointed, and with the additional regret that I had expended so much time and money. I felt that I could fully sympathise with my old master, Sir Charles Stanford, who, after a similar experience, was found playing the scale of C major in the artists' room, in order to clear his brain. I cannot help thinking that the present craze for ugliness must soon pass, and that, given the ability which many of the present generation of composers undoubtedly possesses, we shall one day be able to welcome the return to a sane and healthy style of composition to which it will be a pleasure, instead of a pain, to listen. As a humble composer myself, I rather hesitated before writing this letter, thinking that it might seem presumptuous on my part to sit in judgment on my brother composers, but I have carefully refrained from all personalities, and my remarks are intended to refer only to the general tendency prevailing in much of the music written to-day.—Yours, &c.,

THE BRITISH EMPIRE MUSIC FESTIVAL AND MESSRS. BROADWOODS

SIR,—'Fair Play's' letter in your January issue certainly calls for a reply, seeing that he has given you only half of the facts. It is true that Messrs. Broadwoods offered a gold medal for British composers who submitted the best pianoforte composition, and the numerous efforts were judged by two of the leading British composers, who decided that none of the solos submitted was worthy of the prize.

The organizers of the British Empire Music Festival suggested that we might prefer to hold over the award until next year; but we felt that as the whole object of the prize was to encourage British composers, it would be better to award a medal. The judges had pointed out to us that one composition for two pianofortes showed great merit, and we decided, therefore, to award a medal for this work.

The facts were explained by us to 'Fair Play'—who was apparently a competitor—and we were certainly under the impression that his misgivings had been removed.

Although we have offered another medal for pianoforte solo next year, we certainly reserve the right of transferring it to another section should the solos submitted be considered unworthy of the award.—Yours, &c.,

THE ORGAN-DUET: A SUGGESTION

SIR,—'Feste's' article on duet playing in the December Musical Times recalls an oft-expressed wish of mine, viz., that works for organ duet, impossible of execution by one performer, might now and then be written for the modern organ. The trouble with the Merkel Sonata and other pieces is that there is no particular point in learning them duet-wise, as the complete text can be rendered by two hands and two feet.

The new work should have little for full organ (owing to the fact that one player can produce all that is well-balanced and desirable in this connection), but much in the way of contrasted manuals, colour and solo effects, and the danger of a too stodgy and overloaded pedal part should be avoided.—Yours, &c., LYNNWOOD FARNAM.

JAZZ MUSIC

SIR,—As a regular subscriber to the Musical Times I have read with interest, and often much amusement, numerous articles, letters, &c., appearing in the journal on a subject the writers thoughtlessly or ignorantly call 'Jazz.' The origin of the word, or what it once implied, does not here matter; but what the writers venture to discuss is present-day dance music—of the ball-room, restaurant, drawing-room, or wherever it may happen to take place.

My interest is that, while I dare to call myself a musician (from the age of eighteen to thirty-one I trod the narrow and legitimate path of organist and choirmaster), I earn my daily bread, and a little jam, as a 'jazzer' (the wretched word still clings) or dance musician. My amusement is in the great ignorance of those who will discuss a subject they manifestly know nothing of (your correspondent Mr. Shaw describes it as 'the most popular form of music'), i.e., present-day dance music.

First, may I ask if 'Feste'—who tries to point out that the weakness of dance music or 'jazz' (hic!) lies in its 'almost entire absence of musical interest'—can dance? Or has he visited, say, the Savoy, Carlton, or Piccadilly Hotels, where the best music of its kind can be heard, and tried to analyse the whys and wherefores of this music, and the pleasure it gives day by day to many thousands of people? If not, then surely 'Feste' and others should learn something of the subject—even if they are incapable of feeling the pulse of a modern fox-trot—before daring to discuss its 'musical interest.'

I live, and have lived enjoyably for the past six years, among the people who dance and those who make and play their music (or alternatively among those who do not attend the Three Choirs Festival, the Russian Ballet, or even a City organ recital), and it is known that:

(1.) There must be a four-square measure (8, 16, 32 bars);

(2.) The tune must have a lilt that sets the feet dancing;

(3.) The tune must be vocal and easy of remembrance—generally in a major key with modulations of the first and second order only or chromatic sequences.

(I believe that all classical excerpts popular with the multitude possess one or more of these characteristics, which is the reason of their popularity.)

Now, if your correspondents will examine the popular—verse and chorus type—fox-trot of recent and present time, as used for the purpose of dancing (the 4-4 measure of the fox-trot far outnumbers any other measure or form of melody popular with the multitude), they will find the above essentials, plus an unvarying tempo, which the great public that dances, whistles in the street, or hums at its work, insists upon. They will also find that in order to keep these essentials and yet produce a new tune requires very considerable ability, not a little skill, and a big knowledge and experience of the purpose it is to serve, remembering always that the class of people the tune is for steadfastly refuses to appreciate the work of the Masters. They will also find that the recording and public playing of these tunes (the 16-bar verse and 32-bar chorus of which must be made to last about three minutes, and means several repetitions) has brought forth musicians from this underworld of music who can show a skill in harmonization and the composition of variations which it would puzzle 'Feste' or any other from among our 'recognised composers'—as distinguished from dance musicians—to better.

I would recommend as examples such records as 'Lady of the Evening,' 'Shanghai Lullaby,' 'Somebody loves me,' 'Pale Moon' (H.M.V. records), and 'Never Again' (Brunswick record)—all of which are produced by an orchestra of fourteen or less, and challenge any member of the legitimate profession to write and treat a melody with as much 'musical interest' as any of these. As to performance, I doubt whether months of work on the part of a similar band of legitimate instrumentalists would enable them to give more than a cheap imitation of these examples, for I have found, to my cost, that the orthodox musician—writer and instrumentalist alike, and excellent as his technique may be—is a broken reed where dance music is concerned.

I venture to prophesy that the near future will see our orchestras, small and large, and much of the music written for them, deeply coloured by the work and effort of the modern dance band, especially in instrumentation and the use of instruments.

It is a true saying, and a good one, 'Every man to his trade,' and I sincerely hope your correspondents and readers will use a little common-sense when discussing a subject which is of much import, and unconsciously of much necessity, to the common public.—Yours, &c.,

A. E. DAVISON

['Feste' writes: (1.) Mr. Davison asks if I can dance; I can, but don't. Or, rather, I did, but I don't. But what has that to do with my ability to discuss the musical value of a piece of dance music? Are only the denizens of the Palais de Dance to be allowed to say whether a fox-trot is a good piece of music or a noisy inanity? (2.) I have no objection to a four-square measure, especially in music for dance purposes. After all, scores of the most delightful movements in the Bach Suites are in a regular scheme of the kind, and are none the worse for it. Let our dance music have a lilt, by all means, and let its tune be as vocal and easily memorised as you please. My complaint is that much of it has less real lilt than it pretends to, and that its tune is usually either 'borrowed' (and spoilt in the process), or conspicuously absent. As for its themes being vocal and easily remembered, one of the apostles of the new 'symphonised syncopation' proudly told an interviewer recently that after listening to a whole evening of his band's dance music nobody could remember a bit of it next day! (3.) Mr. Davison points out that the composition of a new tune within the necessary limitations of the dance 'requires not a little skill.' Exactly; and the complaint of musicians generally is that the present-day dance composers as a rule do not possess that skill. Mr. Davison adds that the tune is for the class of people who 'steadily refuse to appreciate the work of the Masters.' But earlier, in speaking of the rhythmical and melodic requirements of dance music, he says, 'I believe that all classical excerpts popular with the multitude possess one or more of these characteristics, which is the reason for their popularity.' So it appears that, after all, Mr. Davison's clients do appreciate the Masters. (4.) I may add that my views on modern dance music are the result of pretty thorough acquaintance, although the taverns I frequent do not include the Savoy, Carlton, or Piccadilly Hotels. I have, however, heard their bands viâ the wireless, and have listened to stacks of gramophone records of the most famous dances played by the crack bands. Mr. Davison speaks of the 'skill in harmonization and variation' shown by composers in this 'underworld of music.' I can only say that very little of it has shown itself in the numerous performances I have heard. Mr. Davison's musical qualifications show him to be one whose views may not be lightly dismissed, but I cannot refrain from suggesting that his six enjoyable years as a player of jazz have perhaps tended to blunt his sensibilities in regard to harmony, &c.]

OPERA v. ORATORIO

SIR,—All Leeds people will echo Mr. Bonavia's eulogy of the work done by Mr. Henry C. Embleton for choral music, but I think that his comparison between oratorio and opera performances will hardly hold, and that he does an injustice to the discernment of the 'Northern man' in assuming that he requires the choral treatment of opera to copy that of oratorio. It is surely not the business of opera to 'prove that it is not a degenerate, but the robust and legitimate descendant of the choral oratorio.' In the first place, it is wrong to refer to opera as a 'descendant' of oratorio: it is rather its twin sister, for as a matter of fact the earliest 'opera' and the earliest 'oratorio' were produced in the same year. And in modern times, far more than in those early days, their courses may have run parallel, but still have been distinct. I unfortunately missed the Leeds Choral Union's concert performance of 'The Flying Dutchman,' but can quite believe Mr. Embleton's estimate of the singing of the Spinning Chorus, by such a fine choir, as 'a marvel.' It is a proof of the intrinsic beauty of the music that it will bear a treatment which destroys all sense of proportion, but in an operatic performance the idea of Senta's little working party being multiplied to some hundred or more hefty West Riding singers would be as much a distortion as the provision of a crew for the Dutchman's bark big enough for a liner. The fact is that these concert performances are acceptable only because we have in the provinces so few chances of hearing the works in their proper place, so we forgive such anomalies. To take a converse case: Berlioz's 'Faust' was of course written for the concert-room, but when the Carl Rosa Company produced it years ago as an opera the little male-voice choirs gave a far more convincing interpretation of the mock 'Amen' than I have ever heard from the many choral societies that have essayed it. Their stage experience and flexibility or style realised, for the only time in my experience, the burlesque intention of this episode. This, I think, goes to support my point that we look for different methods in oratorio and opera, and a chorus like that of the Leeds Choral Union has a place distinct from that occupied by the very efficient chorus of the B.N.O.C. And, when I come to think of it, the latter Company's interpretation of the opening chorus in 'Samson and Delilah' might also be styled a 'marvel,' for its dramatic truth could not be exceeded, and no increase in power could make it more impressive.—Yours, &c.,

HERBERT THOMPSON.

STERLING MACKINLAY

SIR,—The report that I have died is widespread, the fact being that it was the death of my younger brother, Kenneth. My friends and pupils have been inundated with inquiries and condolences. In addition to these, communications have arrived addressed to my Executors, quite apart from the expressions of astonishment at my being alive among those whom I happen to meet.

During twenty-five years of professional work in music and literature I have invariably been known as Sterling Mackinlay, without any other description.

A number of London and provincial papers headed the report of the inquest with the words 'Mr. Sterling Mackinlay.' Others put 'brother of Miss Sterling Mackinlay,' instead of indicating that it was her younger brother, who was commonly and professionally known as Kenneth Mackinlay. One paper, if not more, actually reproduced my own photograph as that of my brother.

My statements to the coroner at the inquest unfortunately did not appear in any of the reports, and no reference was made to my existence.—Yours, &c.,

BACH FORGOTTEN? WAGNER DERIDED?

SIR,—In your January number, 'H. G.' speaks of a time when 'Bach was practically forgotten and Wagner was derided.' What time could this be? Wagner was very much derided from 1852-76; afterwards, from the first Bayreuth performances, his success was attained, however much some folks continued to sneer. But was Bach 'practically forgotten' then? The supposed neglect of Bach is commonly overstated; see, for instance, Burney's 'Tour in Germany' (1773), and Forkel's 'Life of Bach.' In 1850 the Bachgesellschaft was formed, for the purpose of publishing Bach's complete works; and the largest sacred works (Passions, Masses, Christmas Oratorios, Motets, &c.) had long previously been printed, performed, and known. Even in England the organ works were played and edited. The first volume of the Musical World (1836) shows singular appreciation of Bach's genius in Dr. Gauntlett's articles on the 'Characteristics of Beethoven,' especially pp. 56-58. The article in Grove, vol. i., p. 156, on the early diffusion of the choral works in England, should also be consulted. That they were known to comparatively few before 1870, is true; and strange specimens of non-appreciation may be quoted—from, e.g., Hullah's two 'Histories.' The popular appeal of Bach's Concertos, solo and orchestral, was unknown till quite recently. But all this does not amount to Bach being 'practically forgotten.' Perhaps 'H. G.' will oblige us by selecting the particular decade; it must be after the 'twenties, as Wagner, so far from being 'derided,' was a school-boy till 1830.—Yours, &c.,

H. DAVEY.

14, Powis Square,
Brighton.

[H. G. replies: 'I don't regard this matter as one of a "particular decade." When I wrote I was thinking of the long period when the knowledge of Bach was confined to a mere handful of musicians, instead of being widespread as it is now.']

THE 'C MINOR' AT THE CINEMA

SIR,—Is the Musical Times never going to devote any attention to music at the cinema, the institution that provides a livelihood for the majority, probably, of professional musicians? In this month's 'Occasional Notes' I read that 'even in the cinema one may hear at least a movement of the C minor Symphony.' Surely far more people have heard Beethoven at the cinema than in the concert-hall. His big works, like all really first-rate music, rise superior to the limitations imposed by a smaller orchestra than that for which they were composed. Whoever is responsible for the above-quoted remark can hardly realise that cinema music is capable of reaching quite a high standard.

A trio of which I have charge in a small cinema on the outskirts of London regularly performs whole movements of symphonies and overtures, and well-known trios, sometimes a whole trio complete if the film scenes group themselves more or less naturally to such an accompaniment without any violent contrasts. As to the standard of performance, let it suffice to say that the violinist was for some considerable time a member of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, the 'cellist and pianist scholars and exhibitioners at the Royal College of Music.

I have not had any complaints from the management that the music is too highbrow, as, of course, there has to be a judicious admixture of music of a lighter kind.

It would be so much less discouraging to read some intelligent remarks on cinema music, instead of an occasional snub. The standard of musical appreciation of the public at large owes not a little to the zeal of keen and enterprising cinema musicians, who are not necessarily found in the most sumptuous picture theatres.—Yours, &c.,

E. Twickenham. J. LAURENCE CLARKE.

Sharps and Flats

For me, as an artist and musician, I must confess Bach is a colossal bore.—W. J. Turner.

Such a confession has the merit of frankness, and is by no means uncommon; but I cannot resist pointing out that the people who make it are rarely acknowledged to be musicians.—F. A. Clarke.

Mr. Turner is well on the way to becoming the foremost critic of things musical in the land.—Scott Goddard.

I don't know how I made my success. I just made it. I didn't have any early struggles. I never thought of starving in a garret. We had one—but I went up to eat apples in it, and I was a long way off starving by the time I got through.—Reinald Werrenrath.

I detest modernist music. I am not a modernist. I go back to Bach, not Bach as we know him to-day, but Bach as he really is. I go back to Bach and Palestrina and the old Russian Church music.—Igor Stravinsky.

It is open to any mediocrity to innovate in music; and, as we see in abundance to-day, new things can be done by composers who cannot do anything else. But in the long run a composer's innovations will neither save him nor break him. All that ultimately matters is the quality of his music.—Ernest Newman.

A thoughtful moralist, seeing the wastrel that the youthful Wagner was developing into, might, if he had had school authority over him, have made a respectable member of society of him; but in that case should we ever have had 'Tristan' or 'Parsifal'?—Ernest Newman.

To this monstrous doctrine and the necessary inference from it that if you would produce artistic masterpieces you must wallow in amorous vice, I wish to utter a vigorous protest. The truth, as I see it, is that Wagner would have produced infinitely greater music if he had not been the 'dirty little cad' he was.—H. K. Gornall.

I have two new works—a Pianoforte Sonata which has never been played, and a pianoforte Concerto. . . . Only I can play it. That is, I won't let anyone else do it until I no longer want to. It is a matter of personal loyalty to myself.—Igor Stravinsky.

The only music typically American is that made by the mocking-bird, the saxophone, and the cash register.—Boston Post.

Sixty Years Ago

From the Musical Times of February, 1865:

The first Conversazione of the College of Organists took place on Tuesday, February 17, at Freemasons' Hall, Great Queen Street, when a concert was very excellently performed before a large number of the friends and supporters of the new Society. By the published report, we perceive that there are nearly a hundred and fifty members; that two prizes of ten guineas each for original compositions have been offered; and that for these prizes ninety works have been received, and are under examination. If anything can be done by this Society to raise the status of organists—a consummation which pre-supposes that the clique feeling, which has been the ruin of so many musical undertakings, can be kept out of it—we need scarcely say that we wish the College of Organists every success.

New Edition by Mrs R. Valentine. Cloth gilt, 4*s.* 6*d.*, illustrated with 200 Engravings by John Gilbert and others.

THE GIRL'S OWN BOOK; being a Compendium of Innocent and Healthy Games for In- and Out-of-door Recreation, including the Rules for the Game of Croquet, Embroidery, Fancy Work, Wax Flowers, Games of Memory, Enigmas, French Jeu-de-Mots, Puzzles, Music, &c.

The Amateurs' Exchange

Under this heading we insert, free of charge, announcements by amateur musicians who wish to co-operate with others.

Violinist (young gentleman) wishes to join string quartet or pianoforte quintet, as first or second violin. London district.—A. D. M., c/o Musical Times.

Fulham 'Cecilian' Orchestral Society has a few vacancies for good players—'cellos, violins, violas. Rehearsals, Mondays.—Hon. Secretary, 209, Munster Road, Fulham, S.W.6.

Vacancies for flute, oboe, double-bass (orchestra's own instrument), and French horn, in the Orchestra meeting on Tuesdays, at 8, at the Unitarian Church Hall, Clarence Road, Kentish Town, N.W.5.

Camberwell W.E.A. Choral Society and Orchestra has vacancies for all voices, especially tenors and basses, and also string players. Practices, Thursdays, at 8, 19, Peckham Road, S.E.5.—Secretary, Mrs. Flood, 7, Addington Square, S.E.5.

'Cellist invited to complete string quartet for chamber music. Quantity of good music.—Hunt, 41, Eardley Road, Streatham, S.W.16.

Vocalist (soprano) wishes to meet accompanist one evening a week for practice. Modern music.—C. M., c/o Musical Times.

Crouch End Orchestra has vacancies for good amateur instrumentalists.—Prospectus, Hon. Secretary, 122, Brougham Road, Dalston, E.8.

Lady pianist wishes to meet violinist and 'cellist (advanced students) for practice of sonatas and trios. Excellent library.—L. G., 1, Fontaine Road, Streatham, S.W.16.

Young lady pianist wishes to accompany stringed instrumentalists or vocalists.—B. R., c/o Musical Times.

Bass-baritone wishes to meet male vocalist, who can also play the pianoforte, for mutual study of songs and theory. Must be keen musician.—J. Fordham, 34, Crediton Road, Kensal Rise, N.W.10.

Pianist and violinist wish to meet lady 'cellist for practice of classical trios.—18, Normanton Road, Clifton, Bristol.

String players wanted to form a permanent orchestra for the study of English string music from Byrd to Holst.—F. Adlington, 108, Greenfield Gardens, N.W.2.

'Cello student (lady or gentleman) wanted to complete quartet for the practice of chamber music. Central London.—G. E. Barber, 19, John Street, Bedford Row, W.C.1.

Capable second violinist and 'cellist wanted to complete pianoforte quintet, for mutual practice, one or two evenings a week. Classical music.—K. M. B., 42, Endymion Road, Brixton Hill, S.W.2.

Pianist (gentleman) wishes to meet vocalist or instrumentalist for mutual practice.—J. S. C., 4, Willow Terrace, Windmill Lane, Cheshunt, Herts.

Accompanist (lady) wishes to meet instrumentalist or vocalist for mutual practice. N. London.—O. E. S., c/o Musical Times.

All instruments wanted for Whitefield's Orchestra, Tottenham Court Road, W.1, for monthly Sunday evening service. Rehearsals, Wednesdays, at 8, at Whitefield's. No subscriptions. A violin class, under an able instructor, has also been formed.—Spencer Shaw, 112, Tufnell Park Road, N.7.

Vocalist (young gentleman) wishes to meet gentleman accompanist for mutual practice and musical appreciation. London, S.W. district.—E. J., c/o Musical Times.

Pianist (lady) wishes to meet vocalist or instrumentalist for practice of accompaniments. Holborn district.—I. H., c/o Musical Times.

Young lady vocalist wishes to meet pianist for mutual practice. Weekly.—M., 29, Egerton Gardens, W. Ealing.

Vacancies for flute, bassoon, clarinet, and a few good brass instruments.—Apply at rehearsal, Thursdays, 7.45, Unity Church, Upper Street, Islington, N.1.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The College re-assembled for the Easter term on January 12. Little time has been lost in arranging the term's fixtures, for already some two or three dozen dates are announced, including six orchestral concerts and four or five opera and ballet dress rehearsals. There will be three Patron's Fund rehearsals, one of which will signalise a new departure, being held for the first time out of London, at Birmingham, with the co-operation of the Birmingham Municipal Orchestra.

The Royal College of Music Union, which is a society of past and present students, professors, and members of the council, held its twentieth annual meeting at the College on January 15. A large gathering attended in the concert hall, and had the satisfaction of receiving a report which showed the society to be highly flourishing both in membership and finances.

In common with the theatre and concert world of London, the College has to mourn the death, on January 7, of one of its professors, Mr. Frank Moore. Mr. Moore, who died at a comparatively early age, within two days of his fiftieth birthday, was a Trumpet Scholar of the College from 1900 to 1905, and succeeded Mr. Walter Morrow as Professor of the trumpet. During the last few years he had struggled manfully against illness, and almost up to the last was fulfilling his engagements with a fine courage that won the admiration of his countless friends. The funeral took place at Wandsworth on January 12, the College being represented by Mr. E. J. N. Polkinhorne, the Bursar, in the unavoidable absence of the Director and Registrar.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC

As the result of an open competition held recently, the following have been awarded Scholarships (in various subjects) tenable for one year, with a possible renewal: Violet Annear, George Edwin Ansell, Harry Blech, Albert Bregman, Phyllis Mary Burgess, Eva Noreen Clarke, Eric Cecil Coleridge, Elga Vivien Collins, Constance Edinburgh, Francis Grace Ferry, Dorothy Nellie Fox, Reginald Horace Gibbs, Dora Gilson, Gastone Marinari, Jessie Mason, Wilfred Henry Parry, Clement P. Peters, Vera Alice Blanche Rees, Wynne Alic Saunders, Walter Henry Scrutton, Roberta Genevieve Spencer, Myrtle Clare Stewart, Maisie Enid Thompson, Norman Walker Gwynn Tucker, Ted Warburton, Joyce Marianne Warren, Benny Watman, Yetta Waxman. Ernest Connelly and Maurice Jacobson have been awarded each a University Scholarship (which provides complete instruction in preparation for the Mus. Bac. degree), and May Roberts was awarded a Junior School Scholarship.

It is interesting to record that Prof. Joseph C. Bridge, who has now taken up the duties of Chairman of the Board of the College, is to be made the recipient of a gift of a thousand pounds from the Chapter of Chester Cathedral, in recognition of his forty-eight years' service as organist in the Cathedral; also that the citizens of Chester have decided to make him a presentation prior to his leaving their City to take up his residence in London. This change has of course become necessary because of Prof. Bridge's appointment as Director of Studies in Trinity College. It may be noted that the duties of Director are, in the meantime, being administered by Mr. Edward d'Evry. Reference may also be made to the fact that Dr. C. W. Pearce—who had recently retired on a pension, but whose health has, in the interval, improved in a remarkable way—has accepted the distinction of Emeritus Director of Studies. Thus his long and distinguished association with the College remains unbroken.

The death of two esteemed representatives of the College is announced with deep regret. Miss M. L. Wood, of the Isle of Man, was one of those who have been longest connected with the College, first as a student and then as a local secretary for the holding of pupil examinations. Harry Avison was for some time local secretary of the Harrogate centre.

The number of students for the current term is most gratifying.

THE ASSOCIATED BOARD: AWARD OF MEDALS

The following candidates gained the gold and silver medals offered by the Board for the highest and second highest honours marks, respectively, in the final, advanced and intermediate grades of the Local Centre Examinations in November-December last, the competition being open to all candidates in the British Isles: Final Grade gold medal, Ronald L. Robinson, Grimsby centre (pianoforte); Final Grade silver medal, Mary W. Bateson, Blackpool centre (pianoforte); Advanced Grade gold medal, Valerie Tunbridge, Swansea centre (violin); Advanced Grade silver medal, no candidate qualified; Intermediate Grade gold medal, Constance A. Hope, Wolverhampton centre (violin); Intermediate Grade silver medal, no candidate qualified.

INCORPORATED SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS: ANNUAL CONFERENCE

The thirty-fifth annual conference of the Incorporated Society of Musicians was held at Harrogate from December 30 to January 2.

The first address was delivered by the Vice-President, Mr. A.T. Akeroyd, who reviewed the development of music among the people during the last half-century. He first described the state of music in 1870, when only the Cathedral authorities and the Universities dealt seriously with music, and concerts existed only because they were fashionable. The change to the present vigour of the art, he showed, could be dated back to the Education Act of 1870, which provided for systematic music-teaching in the elementary schools. Although it was long before voice-production came into school teaching, the children of this time learnt sight-reading by the tonic sol-fa method, and thereby improved their acquaintance with music. To meet the wider demand for school music the National Society issued the 'Song Book for Schools,' under the editorship of Sir Charles Stanford, and this proved the foundation of the present vast literature of music for schools. Thus, among the children of fifty years ago, was sown the seed of the musical revolution which their children have carried out.

Mr. Akeroyd went on to describe the principal developments that have occurred in the musical life of the country—the widespread enthusiasm for choral music, the competition festival movement, the multiplication of brass bands, the numerous amateur societies, the popularity of the gramophone, pianola, and wireless, and in the schools the specialised teaching of nearly six million children. With regard to the share of the Incorporated Society of Musicians in this amazing advance, Mr. Akeroyd said:

> 'Forty years ago we were pioneers in one very important subject of musical education, i.e., that of Ear-training. From that time onwards we have done everything possible to encourage teachers of music to place this subject in the forefront of their work. Thanks in a large measure to our propaganda, it has now become a recognised subject in all the reputable examinations in the country. Our Society has had much to do with bringing about the revolution.'

Mr. Akeroyd went on to deal with the domestic politics of the Society, and spoke at length on the problem of the registration of music teachers and the peculiar difficulties which surround it. Finally he dealt with the prevalence of worthless professional diplomas granted by unqualified musical institutions.

In the evening of December 30, Dr. Markham Lee gave a lecture on Brahms and his music, songs and pianoforte pieces being used in illustration.

On the morning of December 31, the annual general meeting was held, Mr. Akeroyd being in the chair. It was decided to hold the next conference at Edinburgh on January 2-9, 1926.

In the afternoon a discussion on 'Professional Etiquette' was opened by Dr. A. W. Pollitt, who said that every other profession had recognised the need for a definite code of procedure, and musicians would find themselves in a stronger and much more comfortable position if they did the same.

The evening lecturer was Mr. Percy Pitt, who is controller of music to the British Broadcasting Company. He pointed out the responsibilities that rested on one who had an audience of over a million to consider. He admitted complaints about the intrusion of bad music, but said that there was quite as much complaining about good music.

On the morning of January 1, Mr. Bernard Johnson lectured on the 'Organ as an Educational Medium.' He said the organist could do much to make the people acquainted with the best music. Programmes should be varied in key, style, tone-colour, and volume of tone. Half the battle of successful programme-building was fought in the study. Annotations were most useful, but they were often badly done. It was a subject calling for great attention. All pieces should bear dates. Every date meant something. Short verbal explanations before a performance were very valuable. There was another important thing. It was surprising that the Royal College of Organists had not been able to get security of tenure for the organist. The most musical functions were far too long—an hour and a quarter should be the time aimed at. Punctuality in beginning and ending was of great value. Faith with the public should never be broken. He would forego intervals in a performance. They broke an atmosphere that had been created, and the work had all to be done over again. The organist must be an interesting player, and full of a sincere desire to bring beauty into the lives of the people. He must not be selfish, but should take advantage of all local talent. The parish church should be the centre not only of the spiritual but also of the artistic life of a place. The reward of the organist should be to leave a community better than he found it.

Dr. E. W. Naylor spoke on 'The Romantics—First and Last.' His lecture drew historic parallels, contained apt and excellent musical illustrations, and set a discussion going. At the end he gave a miniature recital.

The last paper of the Conference was by Dr. Eaglefield Hull, on the 'Problems of Musical Dictionary Making,' an occupation in which he saw romance, as well as pitfalls and complexities. He took opportunity to refer to the Swiss Music Teachers' Association, which forbade its members to give a lesson for less than four francs, and made the profession of music in Switzerland as close as those of the law or of medicine.

WORCESTER HARMONY OF THE XIVth CENTURY

The above was the title of a paper read by the Rev. Dom Anselm Hughes, before the Musical Association on December 2. The speaker began by reminding his hearers that there was a gap in our musical history from 1226 to 1415, a mystery period between 'Sumer is icumen in' and the 'Agincourt Song.' Though there was nothing yet on the level of these two examples, there were many pieces in the recently-discovered Worcester MSS. which were well in advance of anything previously known about these mysterious two hundred years, for they included instances of double counterpoint, of form, of imitation, of ground bass, of strong, modern-sounding binary rhythms, and even indications of imitative or fugal entry. Prof. H. E. Wooldridge, in the 'Oxford History of Music,' tentatively denied the existence of any English School before 1420, but had he been acquainted with the Worcester music he would undoubtedly have modified his opinion. Apparently he inclined to the view that where so little had came to light, nothing but small and sporadic compositions could have existed.

In explanation of the great dearth of existing material for the study of mediæval English music, it was customary to lay part of the blame upon the Wars of the Roses, as well as to the depopulation consequent upon the Black Death, and the destruction of MSS. at the Reformation; but these, in the lecturer's opinion, did not constitute an adequate reason. A critical examination of the Reading Rota showed that Reading musicians had a definite background of culture; that they were acquainted with the work of the organizers of the 11th century, and with the contemporary descanters of Notre Dame. The lecturer put forward two suggestions to account for the extraordinary disappearance of English music written between 1000 and 1450. Firstly, it may have been customary in many places to write the liturgical chants on parchment, but the semi-experimental descants, counterpoints, and Motets on paper, or at most on loose parchment leaves or scrolls, not intended for binding into a volume. Some of the Worcester music of later date was written on paper and on scrolls. Secondly, in the Abbeys and Cathedral Priories there might arise every now and then an Abbot or Precentor of ultra-conservative tendencies, and away would go all the prick-song to the rubbish heap, or to the binder's shop, to be replaced by the pure Gregorian chant alone. That such a process took place at Worcester was exceedingly probable, for the MSS. were without exception specimens recovered from bindings—generally of the 15th century—of MSS. in the Cathedral Library, or of old Worcester MSS. which had found their home elsewhere. The proportion of harmonized music to plainsong was as high as four or five to one.

It might be assumed that what was left to us was but a small proportion of what once existed, but even so there were more than a hundred of the Worcester compositions now listed, though not more than thirty of these remained in a sufficiently complete condition for us to score them. This was due to the usual arrangement in writing the Motets being followed, viz., the Triplex on the left-hand opening, the Medius on the right, and the Pes or Tenor at the foot of one or both of the pages, so that unless we were fortunate enough to find two or more consecutive pages in existence, the Motets would nearly always be incomplete. Many of the pages also had been ruthlessly cut down by the binders.

The answer to the question of what origins lay behind this music must be taken in relation to music in other parts of England. There seemed to be a two-fold source of derivation, which for want of better terms might be described as 'sacred' and 'secular,' though of course no such sharp distinction was drawn as is customary in our own days. The condemnation of the Ionian Mode was, in the lecturer's opinion, artificial and arbitrary. Though hardly any plainsong was written in it, yet the Mode was used in the Middle Ages, and in quite respectable religious music, sometimes finding its way into liturgical plainsong, especially in the North of England and in Denmark. The use of folk-songs, such as 'Western Wynde' and 'L'homme armé,' as themes for Masses, was typical of the way in which the mediæval mind blended sacred and secular into one whole. The 'sacred' harmonized music would seem to have come from the Continent with the Normans, the principal centres of art in this division being Paris, Limoges, Winchester, and, perhaps, Chartres. The source of 'secular' English harmony was possibly Scandinavian, and, if so, it percolated through England by means of the Danish invasions, being notable chiefly in the Northumbrian centres. Personally the lecturer believed that the two streams were independent for two or more centuries, until they united in our Vale of Evesham, where the 'West Cuntre' system of thirds, mentioned by an anonymous theorist in the British Museum, met the current of Norman art at Worcester.

The story of the Worcester MSS. dated back about fifteen years, when Canon Wilson, then Chapter Librarian, set about having repaired the bindings of several of the Cathedral Library MSS. The parchment fly-leaves which did not belong to the body of the MS. were in each case detached and placed in a separate portfolio. Owing to various circumstances, not least of which was the war, they had at first received comparatively little attention, but in the last two years the lecturer had had the opportunity of overhauling the fragments more thoroughly, and of including some examination of other old Worcester MSS. which had found their way to the Bodleian, the British Museum, and Magdalen College, Oxford, Libraries, all of which contained in their fly-leaves harmonized music of the 13th and 14th centuries. The most important of these fly-leaves had now been detached so as to be available for photography, and the Bodleian was binding up some of its own fly-leaves afresh, together with rotographs of other leaves of the same original MS. which existed elsewhere. Not the least interesting fact in this search was that several of the sheets could be grouped together as belonging originally to three specific volumes. One such was mainly represented now by six fly-leaves at Magdalen, and one at Worcester; another with a smaller page had about sixteen leaves at Worcester, eight in the Bodleian, and four in the British Museum. The third, of a date some twenty-five years earlier than the bulk of the music—which was of the earlier part of the 14th century—had four double leaves and one single leaf, all at Worcester, and fortunately three of the double leaves were consecutive. The contents of the two volumes first mentioned coincided in part, and for one item, the three-part 'Sanctus et æternus Deus,' we could already begin to prepare a critical text. The 'Benedictus' of this item could now be completed by the addition of Worcester and Magdalen evidence, the uppermost part being at Magdalen and the two lower at Worcester.

To turn from archæology to music, if, said Dom Hughes, we would understand the essential features of the two forms which appeared most frequently in the 14th century—Motet and Conductus—we must think in terms of the text, for that was the view-point of the 13th-century composer. Both forms were usually set for three voices, but they were radically different. The Motet was three texts sung together; the Conductus was one text, but three voices singing, i.e., one voice was accompanied by one or two or (very occasionally) three others, vocalising on the dominant vowel of the text, which was usually though not always 'ah.'

The point of development in the 14th century for which we were all looking was the abandonment of the old Organum doctrines, with their chains of parallel fifths, in favour of the free use of imperfect concords, thirds, and sixths, not only on the unaccented syllables but on the accented syllables also, and we were hoping to find evidence of that shadowy English tradition by which the chord now known as the first inversion was sung in sequence, and of the Gymel—a movement of two voices in parallel thirds. This system was described by the old writers as distinctively English, and English we might conclude in a more real sense as striking its roots back behind the Norman Conquest to Anglo-Saxon, or Danish, or Celtic civilisation. The practical evidence of the music, as described by the old theoretical writers, was almost entirely lacking, but the Worcester MSS. provided us with, among other things, a considerable amount of this missing evidence. It might be safely claimed as a new discovery.

'KING HARRISON'

The only regrettable feature about the production of 'King Harrison' at the David Lewis Theatre, Liverpool, on November 27, was the inadequacy of the performance. The production was entirely in the hands of amateurs—capable enough as far as amateurs go; but 'King Harrison' is the kind of comic-opera which needs the deft touch of the experienced manager to be effective. Its author, Mr. C. A. Alington, Headmaster of Eton College, has all the qualifications of the capable follower of Gilbert—a keen eye for a ludicrous situation, a gift for comic expression, and, above all, a rare talent for verse that is essentially witty. He lacks, however, the practical sense of the theatre which can make these things telling and effective on the stage. We thoroughly enjoyed as much of 'King Harrison' as the imperfect acoustics of the theatre, or the imperfect diction of the performers, enabled us to hear. The audience applauded with warmth the conclusion of each Act. With more efficient arrangement, however, we should undoubtedly have had a still more favourable verdict. Mr. Alington appears to be fully aware of his limitations, and in the preface to the published plays ['King Harrison' and 'The Royal Arms'] he writes with rare modesty that 'Should any manager consider the possibility of producing either play, I need not say that I should be anxious to take advantage of his knowledge to amplify or modify any part as his experience might suggest.' Evidently the Liverpool managers lacked either the talent or the devotion of a d'Oyly Carte, and the actors were left to find out their entrances and their exits, and to discover the rhythm of each scene as best they might. They were not even warned of the supreme importance of clear pronunciation in a play which depends for its effect completely on the ability of the listener to hear and realise the exact value of each word. Such a performance might have been creditable in the case of the 'Mikado' or any other opera well known to the audience; it was not equal to the demands of a new opera—especially of a comic-opera which needs speed as well as accuracy and sureness, liveliness no less than competence.

The scene of 'King Harrison' is set in Antivaria, where the people are anxiously expecting the death of the old King. There are two possible heirs to the throne—Princess Olga, leader of the males of the country, who are all Conservatives, and Prince Peter, leader of the females, who are all Radicals. There exists also an impossible heir in Prince Harry, who had shown early signs of imbecility, and who was sent to an asylum. When the news of the King's death is brought there is general relief:

> 'Ended all our hesitation!
> Past the long procrastination!
> Justifiable elation
> Shining through our grief.'

But the Antivarians are unable to come to an agreement as regards the succession—Radical ladies will have none but the Prince, while Conservative gentlemen will accept only the Princess. In the circumstances they agree to appoint neither, but place on the throne instead an elderly entomologist, Mr. Harrison. In the second Act Harrison's reign has begun. He has pleased and exasperated both rival factions by ordering that the one shall be in power on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, while the other will hold office on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays. Sunday is presumably a dies non. He is on the point of passing another and more tyrannical law forbidding any marriage or engagement between members of the two parties. The reasons for this step are explained by the Prime Minister in a delightful piece of truly Gilbertian humour and logic. But the sands are running out. The Prince and the Princess love each other; King Harrison is the missing Prince Harry who escaped from the asylum and came to England. His subjects demand a truce to party blindness. He resigns the crown of Antivaria for the laurels of the perfect entomologist, and thus

> '. . . . farewell to party quarrels!
> For we know the best of morals
> Is that Love is Truth for ever, and that Truth's for ever Love!'

Arthur M. Goodhart has written for this well-told story music which seemed melodious and tasteful. Occasional wrong notes and the halting pace of the performance gave us, however, no reliable clue as to its fitness for such a theme and for the whimsical verse of Mr. Alington. The score used at Liverpool, moreover, was an arrangement of the original. The resources of the David Lewis Theatre are somewhat limited as regards orchestra, but I have no doubt that in more familiar music these players would acquit themselves with much honour.

B. V.

THE DIAGHILEV BALLET

There cannot be given gratitude enough to the Coliseum management—ever catholic-minded—for enabling the Diaghilev Ballet to be seen in London again. The difficulties attending the arranging of so prolonged a season as we have just enjoyed were manifold and subtle. But they were all overcome by the urgent desire to see how this strange and romantic entity had fared since its previous brilliant successes here. And, having seen, what must our judgment be? What new history has this wondrous organization made for itself? What new glory has been snatched by its protagonists? What new beauty have they reflected? I think the answer assuredly is: 'No new glory; no new beauty; and little new history worth the relating.' Nor is this to be wondered at. It is important to bring to clear mind the exact nature of the phenomenon we call the Diaghilev Ballet. We do not well to regard it as an object of solid definition, as we regard Italian opera or English cricket. This movement, which but a few years ago reverberated through all Europe, was a renaissance—no less. True to the nature of all renaissance, it had its small beginnings. As a young man, Serge Diaghilev published his remarkable magazine, Mir Iskusstvo, which did so much to stir the Russian nation to be alive to the history of its artistic achievements. Then, with unerring judgment, he picked out his painters—Leon Bakst, Benois, Roerick, Gontcharova, Larinov, Derain, and Picasso; his composers, with Stravinsky, de Falla, and Ravel prominent among them; and his choregraphists, Fokine, Nijinsky, and Massine—and with this resplendent band for his reinforcement he marched forth like a crusader to proclaim and establish. This is old history now, but it is wise to turn to it on occasion, if only to realise that the Diaghilev Ballet gained the splendour of its name because it was a 'New Birth.' Now a renaissance cannot go on being a renaissance. I cannot help feeling, however, that most of us here in England forget that obvious fact in this connection. We were once swept away by a sudden great wind from the East, and we expect now to be swept away whenever anything bearing the description 'Russian Ballet' appears before our eyes. No audience in the world can more easily persuade itself that it is transported than a London audience. During the past season at the Coliseum it was easy to observe in the official criticisms a note of striving. Criticism was on its mettle, it must live up to—write up to—a subject of precious quality; it must bring forth its well-chosen adjectives, polish them, and drop them like jewels in the way of its going; it must be witty a little, entertaining a little, and full of sighs and yearning. This attitude led to considerable confusion as to the real significance of the Diaghilev season. It was a memorable event from many points of view, but chiefly, I am persuaded, because of the proven durability of the old successes. Looking back, the ballets which stand out most notably for clear purpose, surety, consistency, and beauty are 'La Boutique Fantasque,' 'Prince Igor,' 'The Three-Cornered Hat,' and 'Les Sylphides.' True, the first is very obviously a fall from grace so far as creative choregraphy is concerned, and for all its spacious entertainment, it cannot be spoken of as typical of the Diaghilev regime. The opening and closing scenes, of course, are always a delightful experience. Massine, however, was happier in his devising of 'The Three-Cornered Hat,' and so long as we have such clever exponents of the Andalusian idiom as Lydia Sokolova and Leon Woizikovsky, it will remain as one of the great attainments of 'multiple authorship.' De Falla, Picasso, and Massine have brought about a coincidence of spirit here that you will hardly find in any other ballet. The Fokine ballets, too, appealed as eloquently as ever they did, even if they emphasised the truth that 'emotional' dancing has its limitations as much as 'classical' dancing. It is precisely because 'Les Sylphides' is so perfectly contained within those confines that it never fails to cast its spell and to hold the imagination without yielding a sense of touch or substance.

That the Diaghilev Ballet is now at a loss for direction, aim, and purpose was plain to see in the much-discussed and loudly-heralded 'Le Train Bleu,' with which the season opened. In all art, dullness is for ever the unforgivable sin. For that reason we can find no shriving for Darius Milhaud and his music, nor for La Nijinska and her choregraphy, nor for Jean Cocteau and his shallow scenario. Milhaud is especially not to be forgiven, for he has proved himself a very ingenious and witty writer of ballet music in his 'Saudades da Brazil,' danced by Lydia Lopokova and Massine, in that nightmare of a production, 'You'd be Surprised.' Here he sets out to parody musical comedy, and succeeds only in adding water to weakness. The jest over-reaches itself (as in the case of his 'Catalogue of Flowers'), and musical comedy laughs last and longest, especially when one remembers the well-favoured tunes which George Gershwin is writing just now. (Of him it can be said that he has added a short span of life to musical comedy.) The best thing by a long way in 'Le Train Bleu' was the execution. Anton Dolin's 'Beau Gosse' was brilliant work wasted on poor material—all the more brilliant in that he had been brought forward as a classical dancer. (In 'Aurora's Wedding,' howbeit, he compared unfavourably with Stanislas Idzikovsky.) La Nijinska herself redeemed her inventions to a certain extent by her amusing caricature of 'La Championne de Tennis.' Having said this, you have said all. Regard it as an opérette dansée, as an eccentricity, or as unfathomable satire, in the end you will find that 'Le Train Bleu' is a thing of nought. 'Man is but an ass if he go about to expound this dream.'

The future of the Diaghilev Ballet will depend upon the accidents of birth. Its leader is still possessed of the old genius for organization, and of a remarkable power of achieving apparent impossibilities; above all he has the special endowment of being able to turn and confound and finally to enlist the Philistines. But for the breaking of new ground he has found nobody to take the places of Fokine and Massine. The erring of Fokine was on the side of 'romanticism'; that of Massine on the side of 'intellectualism'; but both were men of their time, and their talents were the perfect counterpart of a special phase and environment. Now, perhaps more than ever, a sensitive medium is needed, and for all we can know, he is not to be found. It seems, then, that the one remaining hope for this child of art and nature is to return to nativity, and again be brought forth gloriously. BASIL MAINE.

Honorary accompanists are wanted for girls' singing classes at Battersea (Monday evenings) and Poplar. Volunteers should write to Miss M. W. Barbour, Women's Presbyterian Settlement, 56, East India Dock Road, E.14.

London Concerts

'THE MESSIAH' AT QUEEN'S HALL

The Alexandra Palace Choral Society, under Mr. Allen Gill, came up to Queen's Hall on the first Sunday in the New Year to sing 'The Messiah.' Conductor and choir afforded several indications that in happier circumstances they could have done their part well towards a vigorous and fresh 'Messiah' performance. We did not get this by any means, as it happened. Like most other 'Messiah' performances to-day this one amounted to nothing much more than a conventional rite. Such is the penalty meted out by the ironical Fates to Handel, for having composed a masterpiece on a Divine subject! If this music had been associated with a pagan myth we should hear it less frequently, but with a much better execution. But piety here again affords a cloke for bad art.

The faults at this performance were largely due to the assumption that, every one knowing 'The Messiah' so well, there was no need for rehearsal. The orchestral playing was extraordinarily slack. 'But, then' (no doubt the players were saying), 'it is only "The Messiah."' Mr. Allen Gill, while permitting applause, could not spare the time to perform Handel's concluding ritornels. Finally, the solo singing was not (apart from Miss Margaret Balfour) what Handel-singing should be, and the fact that it was apparently found acceptable at this important concert is a measure of the present-day falling-away in singing of the classical style. Charming Miss Dora Labbette, whose appealing manner would no doubt have perfectly fitted some modern music, had not the solid technical basis wanted for singing this. Mr. Tudor Davies adheres still to a peculiar constricted mode of utterance which, by its suggestion of discomfort to the singer, ruins the listener's comfort. A pity, for he might, it would seem, be so attractive, possessing the rarity of a true tenor voice. Mr. Peter Dawson was the bass.

The choir was a good, useful body, and Mr. Allen Gill had it well in hand, and had thoroughly sane views on movement too. Faulty as one has been compelled to declare the performance, it was no doubt excellent measured by the usual standard of Christmastime 'Messiahs.' That, of course, is the pity of it! C.

SHAVITCH

M. Vladimir Shavitch, of Syracuse, U.S.A., first appeared in London, I think, last June, on which occasion Hofmann was associated with him. On January 12 he appeared again, the pianist this time being his wife, Tina Lerner. She played only the Tchaikovsky B flat minor Concerto, perhaps the vulgarest work in the concerto repertory, but she played it very beautifully, and made us wish to hear her in something more and something better. She never gave forth any harsh tone, her execution was fluent and easy, and she showed a sense of the value of the phrase, and treated it accordingly.

There, precisely, was the sort of way in which the orchestra failed. M. Shavitch, as last year, showed himself to be an ordinarily sound, competent conductor, but not one who can—at all events, on the meagre rehearsal allowance of our London orchestras—inspire a body of players to give of their very best, and to make a success of what, by all the rules of commonsense and the experience of orchestras in every country but this, ought to be a failure.

The programme was familiar enough, and if the members of the orchestra had pulled themselves together they could undoubtedly have done better. It consisted of the Concerto mentioned, the Brahms 'Academic' Overture and first Symphony, and the Strauss 'Don Juan.' That is not the sort of programme we have the right to expect from our L.S.O., for surely every concert should have its touch of modern interest. But it is about the only sort that this season these players are giving us.

We used to be proud of this Orchestra, and we shall be again—some day, when it stops playing the fool with conductors from the ends of the earth (a different one at almost every concert) and settles down to a hard 'grind' under a good man who will not spare its feelings in the effort to redeem its reputation. The material is there. We know that! P. A. S.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERT

The programme of the first symphony concert could be almost described as reactionary, for apart from a selection of Gustav Holst's 'The Planets' it consisted of compositions by men whom the younger generation of twenty years ago would undoubtedly have dubbed 'old fogies'—Handel, Haydn, and Mendelssohn. Of course the younger generation exaggerated things twenty years ago as younger generations are wont to do. But surely there was something too much of this going back to the old in Sir Henry Wood's scheme? He tried to enliven matters by touching up the Handel Concerto and adding brass and drums to the score. The 'touching up' process was well done, yet the experiment was not altogether a success. You cannot make a good cocktail with port wine, no matter how well-measured is the proportion of bitters. The Haydn Symphony, on the other hand, was a delight, and a well-thought-out performance realised to perfection the delicate charm of this old-world music. The organ part of the Handel Concerto was played very ably by Mr. F. Kiddle, and the violin part of Mendelssohn's Concerto was even more brilliantly played by M. Toscha Seidel. But even if Seidel had rivalled the late Sarasate in skill and brilliancy, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto would be Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto for a' that, and we have had too much of it in the last thirty years. I have not the slightest desire to belittle its virtues. I maintain only that it is possible to have too much of the best of things. The Pianoforte Concerto in G is not a bit less brilliant an achievement than the Violin Concerto. Yet it is long since by common consent it was placed on the retired list. The rest of Seidel's programme was, from the point of view of a symphonic concert, wholly negligible. B. V.

THE BUDAPEST QUARTET

The Budapest Quartet gave its first recital in London on January 12—successfully, on the whole. But the first few bars of the Mozart Quartet in G raised hopes that were not to be realised. The playing at the opening was so straightforward and devoid of exaggeration that it aroused memories of the great classical quartets of the past. As soon as the players reached the second subject it became clear that Mozart, however much they liked him and however neatly they played his music, was not 'in their bones.' They stressed certain notes in that characteristic theme in a way that must have jarred the nerves of the true Mozart-lover. Later on, the speed of the last movement, and the rallentandos at the close of the after movements, confirmed the impression that Mozart was not the strongest card in their hands. They were much happier in Beethoven, and happiest, perhaps, in an exacting Quartet of their countryman, Béla Bartók's. I confess that my first impression of Bartók's work was one of somewhat commonplace ideas very elaborately decked out. It will never do to be cock-sure about novelties, and if this opinion should have to be revised later, let me also add that I had no opportunity for seeing the score either before or after the performance. But whatever one thought of the music, there could be no question as to the excellence of the performance, admirable for unanimity and accuracy. B. V.

MILHAUD, BARTÓK, GOOSSENS

The Chelsea Music Club gave an enlivening concert at Chelsea Town Hall on January 13. Mr. Eugène Goossens was in charge, with an excellent small orchestra.

Perhaps M. Darius Milhaud did not write his Symphony for ten string parts pour rire. But whether he did it with a towel round his head or with a tongue in his cheek, we were amused. If he meant it for a serious essay in 'juxtapoint,'* why did he call his three movements Introduction, Chorale, and Study, and make them ape the 18th century while talking like the 21st? The string parts behaved individually like the parts of an old suite, but they quarrelled violently among themselves. It was a comedy. One said, 'I would like to hear that again, but not just now.'

There are several ways of arranging old folk-tunes for concert work, and none better than M. Bartók's as shown in his seven Rumanian Folk-Dances. The tunes have a tang in them, M. Bartók's harmony is just exotic enough to take them well away from the drawing-rooms of the west, the orchestration is vivacious, and each piece says what it has to say and leaves it. M.

After these two new works the wood-wind began to rehearse a third, the band parts having just arrived. Then the players emerged from the artists' room and triumphantly played it—Mr. Goossens's Fantasy for flute, oboe, two clarinets, two bassoons, two horns, and trumpet. If the Fantasy suffered a jot in this hasty process nobody observed it, for it is not all of it music in which a wrong note sounds obviously wrong. Stridor and clangour, well-voiced, alternate with bits of almost Puccinian restfulness. We may talk here of twelve-tone writing, because Mr. Goossens himself has talked of the twelve-tone scale as an exploring-ground. Here was no vagueness, trickery, covering of weakness. It was a spirited saying, and rather romantic in its language. One said: 'I would like to hear that again, and at once.'

Other events were the first orchestral performance here of Ravel's 'Tzigane,' Mr. Bernard Reillie playing the violin solo; and some straightforward Bach singing by Mr. Frank Phillips. M.

* Counterpoint of tonalities, juxtaposition of sonorities, &c.

THE KINSEY QUARTET

Frank Bridge's 'Phantasy' Quartet suited admirably the style and temperament of the Kinsey Pianoforte Quartet, which gave a first recital at Æolian Hall on January 13. The players are very well matched, and if their ensemble has not yet the mathematical accuracy of a quartet of long standing, it is nevertheless already free from the stiffness and singularity that usually go with a performance by a new organization. If their Brahms was less completely convincing it was not because of any fault of ensemble or technique, but merely on account of individual views of interpretation which did not quite agree with our notion of how these great Brahmsian melodies should be treated. No doubt both views are defensible. We all of us, however, must testify according to the truth that is in us, and in any case this merit or shortcoming does not in the least detract from the general worth of the new Quartet, which is high, and gives certain promise of being higher still in the near future. B. V.

TOSCHA SEIDEL

M. Toscha Seidel's various appearances and performances in this country have not so far justified the extravagant rumours by which they were heralded. There is, of course, no question of technical skill. He is a born violinist. Had he been brought up in a miners' camp, he would have fashioned some kind of an instrument and mastered it to the point of charming those children of nature—two-gun Pete and Hell-for-Leather Joe. In a civilised community such a being becomes inevitably a soloist, and Seidel has all the additional qualifications of the virtuoso—reliable memory, a flair for telling effects, and a pleasant platform manner. If these things do not enthral us as they would have done forty years ago, it is that with the great progress in the art of violin playing which began with the appearance of Kubelik there has been also a higher standard of appreciation and criticism. We are apt to take for granted great executive ability in a soloist, and to give greater importance to interpretative genius. So far Seidel has not given us an opportunity to gauge his talents in this direction. The Mendelssohn Concerto he played at Queen's Hall has been played so often and by so many different players that it can no longer bear an individual stamp. There was a time when the last movement acted as a sort of race-course for virtuosi who wished to test speed and staying-power. That, however, was stopped years ago by Lady Hallé's refusal to bow to fashion, and proving conclusively that a reasonable pace was far and away most suitable for the music. Since then, any violinist who attempts the Concerto must perforce reproduce some feature common to the reading of another. At Wigmore Hall, Seidel played a Nardini Concerto, exceedingly simple, unsophisticated music, a rather unimaginative Suite of Sinding, and the 'Dido' Sonata of Tartini. The last was the only piece with musical pretensions, and he played it very sweetly and very neatly. But we are still waiting to see this fine technical apparatus put to its proper use, viz., the interpretation of great music. B. V.

MALE-VOICE CHOIRS

The concert of the London and North-Eastern Railway Musical Society, at Queen's Hall, on December 20, has three claims on the memory: (1) The size of the male-voice choir, which numbered over two hundred and fifty, all genuine railwaymen; (2) the restraint and sobriety of Dr. Stanley Marchant's new cantata, 'Christmas Eve'; (3) the general air of bonhomie—the programme was Christmassy, and Col. W. Johnson Galloway had the audience singing on every provocation.

A brother choir to the above—the Railway Clearing House Musical Society—gave its concert at Kingsway Hall on January 14, under Mr. John E. West. Here was a programme rich in good things, arranged more or less historically—madrigals, glees, a bit of Mendelssohn ('To the Sons of Art'), part-songs, with folk-song arrangements and the 'Tannhäuser' Pilgrims' Chorus for further variety. The choir rose to its best in its most difficult work—Dunhill's 'The Wind and the Rain.'

Competition Festival Record

THE ELIZABETHAN FESTIVAL

The third Festival takes place at Kingsway Hall on February 23, 25, 27, and 28. Here is a feast of beautiful music—helped by the salt of competition, and the good counsel of the judges—that should be warmly supported by the musical public of the London district. We are glad to hear that the entry is good. The syllabus may be had from the hon. secretary, Mr. A. H. M. Kempe, 36, Connaught Square, W.2. Readers should look out for the public announcements of the times of the sessions, which are not yet settled, as entries are still being received at the time of writing.

Huddersfield.—The Mrs. Sunderland Competitions open at Huddersfield on February 11. The competitors' list is larger than before, although fewer choirs have entered.

Winchester.—The Winchester and County Musical Festival is to occupy five days in March. Five orchestral concerts have been arranged, one under Mr. Adrian C. Boult, the others under Dr. Malcolm Sargent.

Music in the Provinces

Allendale.—In the Temperance Hall, on December 13, the Choral Society performed 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' and part-songs by Brahms and Cowen. Mr. H. Harland, of Newcastle, conducted, and Mr. G. Hodgson was the tenor soloist.

Barnstaple.—At the concert given by the Musical Festival Society, on December 11, the choir sang Elgar's 'The Snow,' with string and pianoforte accompaniment, and 'Fly, singing bird,' Cornelius's 'The Surrender of the Soul,' and 'Come, if you dare' from Purcell's 'King Arthur,' with Dr. S. R. Gibbs as soloist. Miss Mary Moore and Mr. Keith Falkner sang songs. Dr. H. J. Edwards, conductor of the Society, played pianoforte music, and joined Mr. Alfred Moyle in Elgar's 'Cello Concerto.

Birmingham.—At one of the weekly mid-day concerts a small body of string players, with Mr. J. Hoch in charge, gave a delightful performance of Mozart's Serenade for strings. A Handel Concerto Grosso and Bach's 'Brandenburg' Concerto No. 3, were also given with much spirit and enjoyment. On another occasion a player new to the city was heard in violin solos by Bach and Dvorák. Miss Katie Goldsmith is finely equipped with brilliant technique and musical feeling. Her playing of the unaccompanied Bach Chaconne was rich in tone, and held the listeners' interest to the end.——The Edna Willerby Trio (the Misses Edna Willerby, Gwenda Eaton, and Audry Evans) gave a sincere and musicianly performance of Haydn's Trio in A major on January 15. A Phantasy in C minor by Frank Bridge was also given, though here an over-slow tempo told against the work.——The Dorian Trio (the Misses Kathleen Washbourne, Pauline Taylor, and Enid Lewis) showed sound musicianship, and played with sympathy and understanding, on January 10. The players come from Wales, where they are engaged in the propagation of chamber music in the schools and colleges. Three pieces by Armstrong Gibbs were included in the programme, with two Welsh Miniatures by E. T. Davies, and Rutland Boughton's 'Celtic' Prelude.——At the third concert of the Catterall series, the programme consisted of works by Brahms. In the C minor Pianoforte Quartet and the Quintet in F minor, Miss Beatrice Hewitt was the pianist. ——At a Sunday night concert, Mr. Paul Beard, the leader of the City Orchestra, played Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. Bantock's 'Old English' Suite—an arrangement of five pieces by Byrd and others—was included in the same programme.——The principal feature of the Sunday night concert on January 11 was the second performance in England of Delius's Violoncello Concerto. The work is in the composer's own peculiar idiom. The writing for solo 'cello is especially beautiful, and is very much the outstanding thread amid a closely woven texture of characteristic Delius harmonies. Miss Beatrice Harrison was an inspired player in the solo part. At the same concert a little-known Motet of Mozart was beautifully sung by Miss Emily Broughton.

Bristol.—In the Salon of the British Music Society, on December 15, the Clifton Chamber Concert Quintet played Debussy's Quartet in G minor, Brahms's Violin Sonata in G, and Fauré's first Quartet for pianoforte and strings. The players were Miss Winifred Davey (pianoforte), Mr. Maurice Alexander and Miss Hilda Barr (violins), Mr. Alfred Best (viola), and Mr. Percy Lewis ('cello).

Bury.—In the Athenæum Hall, on December 15, were performed Haydn's sixteenth Symphony, arranged for flute (Mr. C. W. A. King), violin (Miss Mary Roach), violoncello (Mr. Harvey Frost), and pianoforte (Mr. Leonard Faires), a Pianoforte Trio by Widor, Henry Eccles's Violoncello Sonata, Mozart's Sonata for two pianofortes (the second pianoforte part arranged for flute and violin), and Haydn's 'Surprise' Symphony, arranged for the same instruments. Mr. E. H. Bond (vocalist) and Mrs. Leonard Faires (pianoforte) also contributed to the programme, which was arrranged by Mr. Leonard Faires.

Budleigh Salterton.—On January 8 the Musical Society performed 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' and the 'Death of Minnehaha,' and the Orchestra played the first movement of Beethoven's fifth Symphony. Mr. Hugh Fowler conducted, and Mr. T. J. Woodall assisted at the organ.

Clevedon.—The Philharmonic Society performed the first two parts of 'Hiawatha' and 'A Tale of Old Japan,' on December 16. Choir and orchestra, conducted by Mr. E. H. Hazell, numbered a hundred, and the principal singers were Miss Olive Franks, Miss Winifred Marshall, Mr. Seymour Dossor, and Mr. Reginald Bussell.

Diss.—Ipswich Male Choir, conducted by Mr. J. Job, visited Diss on January 14 and sang Elgar's 'The Wanderer,' Percy E. Fletcher's 'Loraine, Loraine, Loree,' Bantock's 'O Sweet Delight,' Brewer's 'Ballad when at Sea,' and Ethel Boyce's 'The Bowl.'

EASTBOURNE.—Holst's 'Fugal Concerto' was one of the features of a Symphony concert given by the Municipal Orchestra on January 9, under Capt. Amers. The Symphony was Schubert's 'Unfinished.' Miss Marjorie Hayward played the Saint-Saëns B minor Violin Concerto.

FELTWELL.—In the Coronation Hall, on December 11, the Choral Society gave its first public performance, conducted by Miss E. M. Scandrett. The programme included 'The Dance,' from 'The Bavarian Highlands,' 'Love and Summer' (West), 'A Franklyn's Dogge' (Mackenzie), and 'Gipsy Life' (Schumann).

HASTINGS.—Eight hundred children enjoyed a concert provided for them at the Pier Pavilion on January 16 by the Corporation. Mr. Basil Cameron conducted movements from Symphonies by Haydn and Beethoven, Schubert's 'Rosamunde' Ballet music, Gounod's 'Funeral March of a Marionette,' and Quilter's 'Children's Overture.' Mr. Percy Scholes gave the audience a lesson on the orchestral instruments, with vivâ voce question and answer. This was the first of six such concerts sanctioned by the Board of Education.

HULL.—Dohnànyi's Variations for pianoforte and orchestra (on the old French song, 'Ah, vous dirai-je, maman') were played, on January 15, by Miss Helen Guest and the Philharmonic Orchestra, under Sir Henry Wood. The conductor's arrangement of a Suite from Purcell helped to make up an interesting programme.

JARROW. — The Philharmonic Society performed 'Caractacus' on December 17, under Mr. George Dodds.

LEEDS.—Pianoforte Quartets by Joseph Jongen (Op. 23), McEwen ('Nugae'), and Fauré (Op. 115), were heard at the Bohemian chamber concert on January 14, Miss Ivy Smith being at the pianoforte and Mr. Laurence Turner leading the strings.——Mr. Eugène Goossens conducted the Leeds Symphony Orchestra, on January 17, in the 'Eroica' Symphony and Stravinsky's 'Fire-Bird' Suite.

LIVERPOOL.—The second of Mr. John Tobin's informal chamber concerts, on December 15, was devoted to the music of Mr. Gerrard Williams, who gave particulars about the works performed. These included a String Quartet, two groups of pianoforte pieces (among these were 'Pot-Pourri' and 'Propriety, Prunes, and Prisms'), and some songs. The performers were the Barker Quartet, Mr. Tobin, Mr. Hugh Peters, and Mr. John Ward. ——Weingartner was again the conductor at the Philharmonic concert on December 16. The orchestra played Wagner's 'Faust' Overture, Mozart's 'Jupiter' Symphony, the Overture to 'The Mastersingers,' and Beethoven's seventh Symphony. The choir, conducted by Dr. A. W. Pollitt, sang two of Brahms's part-songs, 'Vineta' and 'In Autumn.'——The newly-formed Wallasey Choral and Orchestral Association gave its first concert in New Brighton Tower Theatre on December 17. 'The Messiah' was the work chosen, the performers numbering three hundred and fifty. Dr. James Lyon conducted.——At Crane Hall matinée on December 17, Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins and small orchestra was played, with Miss Isabel McCullagh and Miss Gertrude Newsham as soloists; Miss McCullagh played Handel's Violin Sonata in A, and Miss Edith Stewart sang Arias by Bach and Handel.——On December 17, the Liverpool Choral Society gave 'Elijah,' under Mr. Percival Ingram.——Before members of the British Music Society and the Incorporated Society of Musicians Prof. E. P. Campagnac, Professor of Education at Liverpool University, lectured, on January 6, on 'What is Music?' accepting Sir Henry Hadow's definition: 'The art of creating significant forms in sound.'——At the Philharmonic Concert on January 13 Sir Henry Wood conducted 'Venus,' 'Mercury,' ' and 'Jupiter' from Holst's 'The Planets' (the whole Suite has not yet been heard at Liverpool). The programme further included Parry's 'English Suite,' a 'Miniature Suite' by Andreae, 'The Blue Bird' Suite by Satz, and Goldmark's 'Aus Italien' Overture.——The Repertory Opera Company produced 'The Immortal Hour,' on January 15, at the David Lewis Theatre. Mr. John Tobin conducted, and the principals were Miss Beryl de Willacy, Mr. Samuel Dring, Mr. John Lawrenson, and Mr. Robert Mawdsley.

MANCHESTER.—So rarely does one hear the orchestral accompaniments to 'The Messiah' played with scrupulous and fastidious care, that it seems worth while recording that Harty handled them in a manner only equalled in my experience on two occasions (once by Wood and once by Beecham). And this is all the more remarkable perhaps, as the Orchestra had played 'The Messiah' eleven times inside a fortnight, and probably were (so to say) thoroughly sick of it.——The only Hallé concert given after the recess at the time of writing was the second purely orchestral programme of this season, and the public's habits had hardly flowed back into their normal channels if one may judge by the diminished attendance. Conductor and players revelled in Tchaikovsky's No. 5, and the solo wind players, in a Mozart Divertimento (how accurately the title describes the piece!), almost converted one to the belief that chamber music would be a success in Free Trade Hall. The 'St. Antony' Chorale Variations of Brahms again brought into prominence Harty's qualifications for the interpretation of this composer in his miniature and more fanciful aspects as in the broader and majestic ones. ——Towards year-end and on the eve of its first Continental tour to Warsaw, Lemberg, Lodz, Kieff, and Berlin, the Catterall Quartet once again devoted an entire evening to Brahms's chamber music—the sort of experience that one pigeon-holes for future reference, because everything conspired to make it a great one. Mühlfeld and Draper may have played superbly in the Clarinet Quintet in other days, but there is no mistaking Harry Mortimer's supremacy in these days.——At the second Isaacs chamber concert Miss Hobday, Miss Hayward, and Mr. Cedric Sharpe played the Mozart E major and the Ravel A minor Trios, and Miss Dora Stevens was the vocalist.——On December 19 the committee, conductor, and members of the Hallé Orchestra invited the elementary school-children of Manchester to a specially drafted programme of orchestral music. There were some knowing kiddies who expatiated on the Allegretto of Beethoven's eighth Symphony or the Wagner 'Siegfried Idyll,' or sniffed superciliously at Liadov's 'Musical-Box,' but give me the lad who plumped for Brahms's ''Ungry Dances,' and clapped with his boots during the 'Rakoczy March' of Berlioz. C. H.

NEWCASTLE.—At King's Hall, Armstrong College, on January 10, Miss Vally Lasker and Miss Nora Day played two-pianoforte arrangements of modern orchestral music, including Vaughan Williams's 'Pastoral' Symphony, Holst's 'Beni-Mora' Suite, and Vaughan Williams's 'London' Symphony.——The Buda-Pesth Quartet paid a visit, with Miss Dorothy Helmrich, on January 15, and played, in addition to Schumann and Tchaikovsky, a Dittersdorf Quartet.

OXFORD.—At the third Subscription Concert in the Town Hall, on December 4, the Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Guy Warrack (deputising for Mr. Maurice Besly), played Glinka's 'Russlan and Ludmila' Overture, Delius's 'On hearing the first cuckoo in spring,' and Brahms's first Symphony.— St. Aldate's Choral Society, numbering eighty voices, sang Cowley Carols during Christmas week, and will sing Vaughan Williams's 'Fantasia on Christmas Carols' in February.—— On January 9, the Harmonic Society, under Mr. Reginald Jacques, performed 'The Pied Piper of Hamelin,' Holst's 'A Festival Chime' and 'I vow to thee, my country,' Stanford's 'On a hill there grows a flower,' and Walker's 'The splendour falls.'

PLYMOUTH.—The 'Hiawatha' trilogy was performed on December 8 by the Samuel Coleridge-Taylor Society and the string band of the Royal Marines. Mr. Douglas Durston conducted, and the soloists were Miss Hilda Blake, Mr. Walter Glynne, and Mr. Howard Fry.

TORQUAY.—On December 17 the Winter Orchestra, conducted by Mr. E. W. Goss, played Beethoven's

'Prometheus' Overture, a selection from Thomas's 'Hamlet,' a Serenade by Frank Bridge, and three members with Mr. Goss played Weber's Pianoforte Quartet in B flat. On the next day a Suite, 'My Lady Dragonfly,' by H. Finck, and 'Four Little Dances,' by Herbert Ivey, were performed.

Whitley Bay. — Monkseaton and Whitley Bay Harmonic Society performed 'St. Cecilia's Day' (Parry), on December 16, conducted by Mr. George W. Danskin, and Miss Brown's string orchestra played a Suite by Purcell.——Monkseaton Music Society performed, on December 15, part-songs by Elgar, Waelrant, Brahms, Stanford, and Dunhill; the female voices sang Walford Davies's 'Cradle Song,' MacCunn's 'Night,' and E. Bainton's 'The Elf Queen.' Mr. A. F. Milner conducted. Pianoforte Quartets by Mozart (G minor) and Schumann (Op. 44) were played by Mrs. Heatherington, Mr. T. W. Hardy, Mr. S. Proctor, and Mr. Milner.

Witham.—An excellent concert was given at the Public Hall, on January 13, by Mr. Harold Samuel, Mr. William Primrose, and Miss Joan Elwes, with Dr. Harold Darke as accompanist.

Woking.—On December 13, the Horsell Musical Society performed Bach's 'A Stronghold Sure,' Holst's 'Two Psalms,' and a selection of ancient carols, conducted by Mr. H. Scott-Baker. The soloists were Mrs. M. Walker, Mr. Humphrey Ryle, and the Rev. H. A. Tapsfield.

Music in Scotland

Public music-making in Scotland over the weeks of the holiday season is largely represented by the Scottish Orchestra concerts, and the customary 'Messiah' performances—north, south, east, and west.

Edinburgh.—The programmes of the Paterson Orchestral Concerts, now in their thirty-fifth season, were generally similar to those of the Scottish Orchestra concerts at Glasgow, but contained some individual features, notable among which was a young people's Christmas concert, at which Sir Landon Ronald and the Scottish Orchestra played eight familiar Overtures, ranging from 'Zampa' to 'The Mastersingers,' to a delighted holiday audience of children of all ages from seven to seventy.——Prof. D. F. Tovey's work as Reid Professor of Music at the University, and as conductor of the Edinburgh Reid Symphony Orchestra has been rather badly upset by his serious illness, from which happily he is now recovering.

Glasgow.—Sir Landon Ronald succeeded Felix Weingartner as guest-conductor of the Scottish Orchestra, and again demonstrated his familiar qualities of easy technical competence, sound judgment, cool sanity of outlook, sense of line, and an unsurpassed flair for keeping audience and orchestra alike happy and comfortable. He won his greatest success with an impressive performance of Elgar's A flat Symphony, which was received with gratifying enthusiasm. ——Sir Landon was succeeded in turn by Vaclav Talich, from Prague, a newcomer who has already secured a hold on the Scottish public which is beginning seriously to threaten the hitherto unchallenged sovereignty of the arch-wizard, Kussewitzky. We can recall no finer performances of the 'New World' and César Franck Symphonies than those given us by Talich. New works introduced by him were the Italian Rieti's Concerto for wind quintet and strings, the cleverness and ironic whimsicality of which had their reward, and Novák's symphonic poem, 'In the Tatra Hills,' an engaging 'storm in the mountains' composition, which at any rate served to display the consummate virtuosity of conductor and band.——Mlynarski, who was to have followed Talich as conductor, has found himself unable to leave Warsaw, and has cancelled his engagements; but out of evil cometh good, and Talich will now carry on for an additional three weeks. ——Three instrumental soloists made their first appearance with the Scottish Orchestra. Toscha Seidl, in the Brahms Violin Concerto, displayed a virtuosic technique and a tone of remarkable depth and fullness, and, in his solo work, treated us to a thorough-going and disarming russianisation of Schubert's 'Rosamunde' ballet music. Mr. Ivan Phillipowsky made a capital job of Rachmaninov's C minor Pianoforte Concerto, but was distinctly less successful in solos by Brahms and Chopin. Miss Lilias Mackinnon introduced the Scriabin F sharp minor Pianoforte Concerto to Glasgow, and played solos by Rachmaninov and Scriabin with skill and understanding, but some lack of individuality.——The Glasgow Choral Union, supported by the Scottish Orchestra, revived Haydn's 'Creation' after a twenty-one years' interval, and had a real success, for which most of the credit must go to the conductor, Mr. Wilfrid Senior, who has worked hard to lift the Union out of the old traditional rut of choralism. The chorus work was good in blend, balance, and control, and was by turns suave and vivacious as required, but it did look odd to see so many heads buried deep in the copies in the familiar 'The heavens are telling.' Old habit dies hard!——The Glasgow Orpheus Choir gave concerts at Alloa, Dunfermline, Kirkcaldy, and Ayr.——The Glasgow Bach Choir broadcast effectively from the Glasgow Studio a large part of Bach's 'Christmas' Oratorio.——Miss Dorothy Helmrich gave a song recital, again under the ægis of the British Music Society, Glasgow branch, and presented a large variety of songs of different schools with interpretative insight and personal charm. —— The Caledonian House Ladies' Choir (conductor, Mr. Thorpe Davie), a warehouse choir with a good record in competitive festival work, gave a successful concert of part-songs. ——A new tenor, Mr. David T. Yacamini, conductor of the excellent Perth Madrigal Society, displayed high musical intelligence, admirable diction, a feeling for line, and a voice of pleasant but light and rather covered quality, in a recital which included Holst's 'Four Songs for Voice and Violin,' some lieder, and groups of English songs, old and new, and Scots folk-songs.

Other Towns.—The Paisley Choral Union (Dr. William Rigby, conductor) gave a performance of 'Elijah' at Paisley.——The Scottish Music Merchants' Association has almost completed arrangements for holding another Summer School at St. Andrews in August, under the general direction of Mr. Herbert Wiseman. Sebastian.

Music in Wales

Aberystwyth.—The last College concert of the term, the hundred and sixtieth, was mainly orchestral, when two Handel Overtures, 'Tamerlane' and 'Julius Cæsar,' with additional scoring by music students, were conducted by the students concerned, Messrs. G. K. Smith and Kenneth Harding. Other items were Mozart's Overture, 'Der Schauspiel-direktor,' the first movement of Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony, and Holst's 'St. Paul's' Suite for strings, conducted by Dr. de Lloyd. A small choir sang Palestrina's 'O bone Jesu,' an old Welsh carol, the popular New Year's Eve song, 'Nos Galan,' and Robert Jones's 'Sweet Kate.'——On December 19, about eighty children attending the school violin classes, conducted by B. J. Langley and others, gave an interesting demonstration of the results of their teaching.

Bangor.—The College Choral and Orchestral Society, assisted by music-students and the staff from the sister College at Aberystwyth, and others, gave a performance of Bach's 'St. Matthew' Passion which roused great interest in the neighbourhood. The conductor was Mr. E. T. Davies, the director of the College musical department.

Cardiff.—On December 14, the Harmonic Society (choir and orchestra) performed 'The Death of Minnehaha,' Gounod's 'Gallia,' Elgar's 'The Snow,' for female voices, and the second movement of Beethoven's seventh Symphony. Mr. Williams conducted.——On December 13, the University College Choral Society, with string orchestra, performed Bach's 'Christmas' Oratorio. Dr. David Evans conducted. The small choir sang Purcell's 'Jehova quam multi sunt hostes,' and Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio in B flat was played.

LLANDINAM.—A good performance of Parts 1 and 2 of Bach's 'Christmas' Oratorio was given in this little Montgomeryshire village by the Llandinam and Caersws United Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. W. R. Allen. The Oratorio was preceded by Schubert's 'Song of Miriam,' and a selection of English and Welsh numbers suitable for the occasion. A semi-private repetition of the performance was given at Gregynog Hall in the New Year, when Sir Walford Davies accompanied at the pianoforte, and Mr. Charles Clements at the organ, assisted by a small body of strings.

NEWTOWN, MONT.—A successful performance of Parts 1 and 2 of the 'Christmas' Oratorio was given by the Newtown Choral Society on January 14, conducted by Mr. W. R. Allen. It was preceded by a short selection from Handel's 'Samson,' and a few Christmas carols.

Music in Ireland

Miss Petite O'Hara, in conjunction with Miss Rhoda Coghill, gave an enjoyable pupils' concert at the Abbey Lecture Hall on December 18. Mendelssohn's Overture ('Son and Stranger') and Sibelius's 'Valse Triste' were charmingly played by the orchestra.

American exchanges chronicle the wonderful success of two Irish singers at New York and Boston, namely, Miss Lily Meagher and Miss Jean Nolan. Miss Meagher has toured several times with John MacCormack, and has created a very good impression by her artistic and temperamental singing. Miss Nolan's répertoire is very extensive, and she charmed New York audiences, making a decided hit with her performance of 'The Shepherdess,' a new song by Dermot MacMurrough (Harold R. Wright), the gifted composer of the Irish opera, 'Shaun the Post,' now in the Carl Rosa répertoire.

During the Christmas recess legitimate music was ousted, and for a fortnight or so our ears were regaled with such banalities as 'What'll I do,' 'It ain't gonna rain no more,' &c. Dances and balls are the order of the day, and for the time being the feuds between Republicans and Free Staters are suspended. As customary, the Christmas and New Year services in the various churches were very fine, and the singing of carols has become popular again, a tolerably good sign that the country is returning to normal times after the last few unhappy years.

The Waterford Instrumental Society—suspended during the Great War and the subsequent internecine civil war—has been revived and is to give its first concert under the new regime during the first week in February.

The R.D.S. chamber music recitals were resumed on January 12, when Miss Jelly D'Aranyi (violin) attracted an appreciative audience at the Theatre Royal, Dublin. Miss Ethel Hobday was an efficient accompanist.

Miss Ivy Furlong's Ladies' Choral Society gave a concert in the Metropolitan Hall, Dublin, on January 14, in aid of the Citizens' Hall Fund, the artists including Mr. Percy Whitehead, Mr. Joseph Schofield, and Mr. F. H. Weaving.

Mr. C. Lennox Robinson, of the Carnegie Trust, has been elected a member of the Royal Irish Academy of Music.

On January 11 a unique incident in Dublin musical annals took place, when the St. James's Band, under the direction of Mr. J. D. Markey, gave its hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary concert, quite a remarkable milestone in the history of this famous civilian band. In 1882 the band won the All-Ireland brass band contest at the National Exhibition, Dublin.

The Irish Army Band (No. 1), under Col. Fritz Brase, has been making a provincial tour, commencing on January 11, giving successful recitals in the South and West. Its reception at Kilkenny and Carlow was most cordial.

Adolphe Borschke, a Polish-Austrian pianist, announced as 'almost equal to Paderewski,' has given several recitals at Cork and at Waterford, and displayed considerable virtuosity.

Musical Notes from Abroad

A NEW CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN

The instrumental concerto is not a popular form of composition nowadays. This has been the case at least in Germany, where the contrapuntal style of writing has tended to suppress anything like virtuosity. In recent times German composers have begun to devote themselves to another style of composition. Perhaps it was the Russians who provided an example that has now been followed by their German colleagues. Ernst Krenek, a young composer who is looked upon as hostile to the sensual side of music, wrote a Pianoforte Concerto that indicated an ambition to overcome the dogmatic stubborness of the so-called 'linear counterpoint' and which aspired to a wider liberty in the use of musical means. Then came an opera, 'Die Zwingburg,' which made a deep impression upon part of the public, but did not win a place in the opera repertory. Krenek's latest work is a Violin Concerto, and it is his ripest. This example, which has all the expected character of austerity, attempts to combine the old concerto grosso with the modern concerto. The style is still highly contrapuntal, and there is notable freedom in the texture, the part of the soloist being no less important than that of the orchestra. The most striking feature of this composition is its logical and consistent structure. Some passages are harsh to the ear, but they are generally justified by a texture in which imagination models the sound in a way different from that of other composers. On the whole, Krenek has progressed towards clarity and simplicity, his modernism notwithstanding. There is a real cadenza, long and of little value, but it affords proof of the composer's desire to restore tradition in a modern sense. There is at times a certain grotesquerie in the music—the composer has not yet developed skill as a humorist—and it ends with a flute passage which is mere nonsense. Whether the new Violin Concerto will have a future cannot be foreseen. If it is not really beautiful, certainly it is very impressive, and was very heartily applauded by an audience ready to acknowledge the signs of musical development. The interpreter of the solo part was Alma Moodie, a violinist born in Australia and educated in Germany, who played the work with wonderful energy. The orchestral part was very cleverly conducted by Franz von Hoesslin, general music-director at Dessau.

MAHLER'S TENTH SYMPHONY

Vienna, Prague, and Amsterdam having heard the so-called 'tenth' Symphony by Gustav Mahler (in reality it is only a fragment consisting of sketches never destined for public performance, at least in the state in which they were found), Berlin had to do the same. Otto Klemperer, the most gifted among the younger conductors, a Mahlerian type, conducted a performance of the Symphony at the Berlin Philharmonic. Let us hope it will be the last. Mahler never ceased to correct and refine his works till they were performed, and he certainly would have improved this one, both in its sonority and in its structure. The part called Intermezzo gives one the impression of a Mahlerian work. It is very short, and resembles those ironical Scherzi which began with the third movement of his second Symphony. This Intermezzo, although not adding any new item to Mahler's physiognomy, yet may be accepted as characteristic of him. But this is not the case with the Adagio, which, evidently inspired by the solemnity of Anton Bruckner's Symphonies, remains in a rather preparatory state. If anyone was able to carry out Mahler's ideas, it was Otto Klemperer, but he could make no more of the work than it is.

VIRTUOSI

Of these we have had two, both fully competent. The more striking was Vasa Prihoda, the Bohemian violinist. The other was the Polish pianist, Ignaz Friedman. Kubelik, the once-famous, appeared only the shadow of what he once was. He played a Violin Concerto of his own, cleverly written by a musician who thinks not only of his instrument, but also of music. If another violinist had played it, it would not have failed to make an impression upon the hearers. Adolf Weissmann.

NEW YORK

Mr. Gatti-Casazza promised us at the beginning of the season two novelties, and one of these has already been given at the Metropolitan. 'Janufa' is a novelty in more senses than one. The composer himself, Leos Janacek, a man of three-score-and-ten, was unknown out of his native surroundings in Czecho-Slovakia until Marie Jeritza sang the title-rôle of this opera at Vienna in 1918. Unfortunately the work is sung here in German, but the whole atmosphere, scenery, costumes, folk-songs, and dances are typically Czech, and it would be quite as appropriate to sing it in English as in German. It is dramatically acted, by both Jeritza and Metzenauer (the step-mother) who, instead of wearing gorgeous Wagnerian costumes, makes her appearance bending over the wash-tub. As a spectacle 'Janufa' can be called a success, but as a musical composition there is nothing in it to remember but the folk-songs and the dances. Undoubtedly in its native land the music as well as the scenery, costumes, &c., would appeal to the listeners, but it is not an opera that could be successful so far from its home.

The latest 'revival' of the season at the Metropolitan bids fair to be an immense success. It is many years since 'Falstaff' was last given at our opera-house, and the title-rôle is again sung by its last impersonator, Antonio Scotti. Mr. Scotti is known in England as well as in America as an inimitable actor, and although it is ten years since he was heard at Covent Garden, his voice retains remarkable freshness. Even after his twenty-five consecutive years at the Metropolitan the great artist in this first performance showed no fatigue in 'Falstaff,' although he was on the stage almost from the beginning to the end. He was surrounded by an excellent group of fellow-artists. The scenes and the stage management were so sumptuous and so perfect that no words but superlatives can be used in speaking of them. One could suggest to Mr. Gatti that he need not search for novelties when he can give us such revivals as 'Falstaff.'

The League of American Composers and the International Composers' Guild were both formed for the ostensible purpose of introducing 'modern music' to an ill-informed public. It is true that both of these organizations have a large band of followers who applaud indiscriminately everything that is performed, but this does not mean that music is to be revolutionized and all that is sane is to be relegated to the ash-bin. No better fate than this is deserved by much of the modern music we are obliged to listen to, and probably most of it will sooner or later be found there, but occasionally some of it presents us with new ideas that have value. Perhaps the most interesting feature of the first concert of the Guild was the first appearance in New York of Eugène Goossens as conductor. He conducted a long list of freakish emanations from both known and unknown brains, and added his own Fantasy for wood-wind. The fact that these ultra-modern achievements are received with delirious applause from packed houses would be less disturbing to our equanimity were it not for the undisputed fact that this love for distortion and 'something different' seems to affect everybody. Thus almost all our favourite conductors are striving to give new readings to our best-beloved classics. When Mr. Stokowski feels called upon to sentimentalize the nobility of Franck's D minor Symphony, we feel like weeping, and wish we had stayed at home.

So far Kurt Schindler has escaped the disease, and not only gives us novelties and unfamiliar compositions that deserve a hearing, but also without any attempt at sensationalism. Mr. Schindler's Schola Cantorum has no competitors, for no other choral organization attempts to produce the things he offers to the public. His principal number in his first concert this winter was the fourth Act of Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Sadko.' The complete opera has never been given except in Russia. London, Paris, and New York are familiar with the excerpt, 'The Submarine Ballet,' produced by Diaghilev. The fourth Act is called 'Novgorod Fair,' and is an adaptation from a symphonic poem written on the same theme in the 'seventies, some twenty years before 'Sadko' was produced as an opera. Probably the whole opera would not be successful here, but this excerpt is delightful, showing Korsakov at his best when he seeks merely to entertain. The wanderings of the minstrel Sadko, and his marvellous adventures, are charmingly depicted by orchestra and chorus, and (in a lesser degree) by the soloists. The composer seems to care less for his solo work than for any other. It is to be deplored that we had only two hearings of this fascinating composition, and also that the hearer was constantly distracted by snatches of 'Le Coq d'Or,' so that his whole attention could not be centred on what was less familiar to his ears. The remainder of the Schola concert was devoted to an Act from Chabrier's 'Briseis,' heard here some ten years ago. The composition has merit, but Chabrier is no match for Korsakov, and it seems a pity to present the French music at such a disadvantage.

It is the fashion for Americans, as well as our friends overseas, to scoff at the American composer. But some names deserve immortality, and among them those of Charles Martin Loeffler and Charles Tomlinson Griffes. The untimely death of the latter has been truly called a 'tragic loss to American art.' One of his finest compositions, 'The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan,' was played lately by the Philharmonic Orchestra. In spite of the youth of the composer, this tone-poem is so full of beauty that it is impossible not to believe that world-wide fame awaited his maturity. Charles Martin Loeffler is still alive, and gives us only a few works for orchestra, but these few are gems indeed. His 'Poem for Orchestra' (also played by the Philharmonic this winter) was written twenty-five years ago, and appears again re-scored. If it does not quite reveal the genius shown in his 'Pagan Poem,' Loeffler's imagination entrances us, and always leaves us with the feeling that he still has much to say. M. H. Flint.

PARIS

M. Rolf de Maré and his Swedish Ballet cherish the ambition of renovating the art of choreography. To that effect they declare war on all stage convention, and claim to have captured the very throb of life and shoved it into the new ballets actually presented to the public. A first series of novelties staged at the Théâtre Champs-Elysées comprised 'Le Tournoi Singulier' ('The Golf Links') by M. Roland Manuel; 'Le Porcher,' a ballete derived from a story by Andersen, the music being drawn from Swedish popular songs and dances arranged and orchestrated by M. P. O. Ferroud; 'Le Roseau,' a Persian legend set to music by M. Daniel Lazarus; and 'La Jarre,' a choregraphic story in one Act by Pirandello-Casella, music by Alfredo Casella.

As generally happens, the wildest of revolutionaries prove often to be docile agents of convention. Such is the case with the new ballets intended to upset stage tactics. 'Le Tournoi Singulier' is an amiable effort to explain the old legend of how Love came to be blind. While Love—personified by M. Jean Borlin, the chief dancer and choregrapher of the Company—is out on the links, Folly comes forward and offers to share the game. Forthwith she takes a club, and as a beginning hits Love upon the brow. The latter thereby becomes blind. Venus, with motherly tenderness, takes care of her wounded child, and guides blind Cupid by the hand. Roland Manuel's music is distinguished for its suave melody, and a delicacy in the scoring reminiscent of Ravel. A few glissandos on the trombone warn the hearer that the composer is not unacquainted with advanced ideas.

'La Jarre' is a Sicilian peasant-comedy. Merry villagers are dancing in the square, but a formidable landowner roughly interrupts their mirth. He is, indeed, informed that one of his big oil-vessels has been broken. In violent anger he orders that the hunchback craftsman of the village shall be summoned to repair it. The hunchback enters the jar, to direct the workmen in readjusting the broken pieces. But the neck of the jar is too narrow for him to get out, whereat there is general hilarity and popular dances. The jug is finally again broken, and the villagers carry the hunchback triumphantly away, while the landowner returns home in dudgeon.

For his music M. Alfredo Casella makes able use of Sicilian folk-songs and dance tunes, which strongly betray their Hellenic origin. Lively tarantella rhythms keep the hearer alert. The composer conducted his work, and was warmly cheered.

Thanks are due to M. Gabriel Pierné and the Colonne Orchestra for the first performance of 'Khamma,' a posthumous ballet-music by Debussy. The programme did not explain how this work, after having been shelved for about twelve years, was now given the honour of public performance. Some critics affirm that this ballet was to have been staged in 1912 by the Théâtre Champs-Elysées, but that the scheme fell through owing to the bankruptcy of the company. The scenario is by W. L. Courtney and Mrs. Allan. Khamma is a girl dancer who immolates herself on the altar of the Egyptian god Amun-Ra, in order to save the besieged town from falling into the hands of the enemy. The music falls short of its aim when performed on the concert-platform, and apart from the dramatic and picturesque ideas it is intended to portray. No doubt Debussy's wonderful mastery in the scoring and in the precise indication of delicate impressionistic nuances is visible throughout the work. Its purely musical cohesion is, nevertheless, impaired by the absence of scenic elements upon which the music seems overmuch to lean while the eye of the auditor remains idle and the ear critical. It is hoped that some ballet company will take up 'Khamma' and stage it as the composer originally intended.

The S.M.I. (Independent Music Society) devoted the programme of its hundred-and-fifth concert to works by Joaquin Turiña and Paul Hindemith, performed for the first time. Ten years have elapsed since we last heard Turiña at Paris. For his reappearance before the Parisian public the distinguished Spanish composer chose a Pianoforte Suite entitled 'Jardins d'Andalousie,' and a poem for violin and pianoforte, 'El Poema de una Sanluquena' ('A Woman from San Lucar'). 'Jardins d'Andalousie' is divided into four parts, each bearing a sub-title: (1) 'La Muse de Séville'; (2) 'La Muse aux jardins des Capucins'; (3) 'La Muse au jardin de l'Alcazar'; and (4) 'La Muse dans le Parc.' The composer performed this Suite in sober perfection, displaying the passionate and dreamy poetry of his music. Mlle. Lydie Demirgian, the talented violinist, joined the composer in 'El Poema de una Sanluquena,' in which the generous and imposing violin part is enriched by characteristic harmonies and rhythms allotted to the pianoforte.

Paul Hindemith is described by competent critics as a rising star in the musical firmament of young Germany. His String Quartet, worthily performed by the Roth Quartet, justified this opinion in great measure. The work reveals remarkable musicality, deep emotion tinted with romanticism, a consummate art in string composition, and a large indebtedness to classical tradition. One might be justified in expecting a more marked originality on the part of an artist ranked among the advanced group of German musicians, but as it stands, Hindemith's Quartet is a good augury of more to come.

Thanks to Madame Dubost, the very efficient president of the 'Friends of the Revue Musicale,' we have had more of Paul Hindemith. At a private concert given by Madame Dubost the Amar Quartet performed his String Trio, Webern's six Bagatelles, the Concertino by Stravinsky, and a String Quartet by Schubert. The Trio was admired as a work of deep emotion; Webern's Bagatelles appeared rather unsubstantial and thinly metaphysical; and the salient character of Stravinsky's Concertino impressed us vigorously in contrast with the esoteric tendencies of the two German composers.

In spite of hard times for opera production the Paris Opéra scored considerable success in presenting a new work, 'Arlequin,' a poem by Jean Sarment and music by Max d'Ollone. The author of the text ranks foremost in young French literature, and some critics have gone so far as to call him a coming Shakespeare. M. d'Ollone, a 'prix de Rome' of twenty-seven years ago, has hitherto been hailed as the composer of valuable chamber music and as a conductor who helps to make French music known abroad. As an operatic writer he first drew attention by his opera, 'Le Retour,' performed at Angers and later at Paris, and by 'Les Uns et les Autres,' produced in 1922 by the Opéra-Comique. But the five big Acts of 'Arlequin' proved decisive in establishing this composer in the eyes of the critics and of the public at large.

The subject of 'Arlequin' is human in spite of its symbolism, and fairly original. Harlequin, the buffoon of Italian comedy, becomes a philosopher in grave mood. He is representative of nearly all human beings, who, in good faith, play comedy to themselves and to others. Christine, the seventeen-year old daughter of the king of the Happy Island, is infatuated with Harlequin the actor—brilliant and attractive in the scene—but is bitterly disappointed when, after marriage, she meets him in simple every-day life. She dies, and Harlequin, now aged and with all illusions lost, succeeds to the old king as ruler of the Happy Island, where he continues to play the eternal comedy.

In the music composed by M. d'Ollone there is poetry that is conventional yet acceptable and charming, and its principal merit lies in the truth of the dramatic accent and in the sobriety displayed when dealing with the sensational parts of the play. Much of its success undoubtedly lay in the excellent acting of M. Vanni-Marcoux in the complicated rôle of Arlequin.

A word must be said in praise of the Madrigaal-Vereeniging of Amsterdam. These nine singers, men and women, under the direction of Mij. Sem Dresden, director of the Musical Academy of Amsterdam, were admirable. Their programme ranged from Motets by Palestrina, through Haydn and Mozart down to A. Caplet's 'Agnus Dei' and 'O Salutaris,' and included English, French, and Dutch folk-songs arranged respectively by Holst, d'Indy, and Sem Dresden.

PETRO J. PETRIDIS.

TORONTO

Since I last wrote we have had a busy month. The New Symphony Orchestra and its audiences are both benefiting by Mr. von Kunits's love for Beethoven. At the fourth and fifth Twilight Concerts very vivid and inspiring performances were given of the seventh Symphony and the 'Coriolanus' Overture. In addition there were Moussorgsky's sinister 'A Night on the Bare Mountain,' and Mr. Reginald Stewart in the Tchaikovsky B flat Pianoforte Concerto.

The Brahms C minor, Op. 51, No. 1, and the Dittersdorf Miniature Quartets overshadowed 'By the Tarn' and 'Jack o' Lantern' (Goossens) at the third Hart House String Quartet concert. Large and keen audiences continue to support this very enterprising effort. We are not a chamber music country—yet. A visiting party, the New York String Quartet, pleased rather than interested the Women's Musical Club in an afternoon devoted to Smetana, Mozart, Borodin, Goossens, and Grainger. This influential organization also brought Boris Saslawsky, a young Russian baritone whose welcome artistry (in these sensational days) suffered little from a weak vocal equipment.

We are thankful for one outstanding pianoforte recital, that of Mr. Brailovsky, who is at present the novelty on this Continent. This young gentleman (he is only twenty-seven), with a faultless technique, and a touch of deep and real beauty as his equipment, plays as he feels, regardless of traditional interpretation or phrasing. His Chopin and Schumann were enjoyable, his Liszt nearly interesting.

Valuable local recitals worthy of note were those of Luigi von Kunits and Paul Wells in a sonata programme, Viggo Kihl, Scott Malcolm, and Mabel Prestwich Harrison (pianoforte), Madame Gedenoff and Dorothy Allen Park (vocalists). Next month will bring a feast of chamber music, with the Flonzaley, London String, and Huberman-Bauer Quartets. At last this perfect instrumental form is coming into its own.

VIENNA

OPERATIC AFFAIRS

The Volksoper has collapsed—victim of the present economic crisis and of bad management. It is now in the hands of a receiver, and is playing to small audiences—without any financial backing. The responsibility is with the company, whose members share the receipts.

There is a crisis, too, at the Staatsoper. Richard Strauss remains aloof, although it is understood that his retirement is temporary, and that he will return, more autocratic than ever, in the autumn. Meanwhile, Franz Schalk remains sole director, and is eagerly looking for a first-class conductor. Bruno Walter and Furtwängler are mentioned as possible candidates. The first new-comer to have a trial was Egon Pollak, from Hamburg, who made his début with an orchestrally excellent but otherwise cumbersome and humourless revival of 'Falstaff.' A revival of 'The Bartered Bride' was produced by Franz Schalk, and again the orchestral part of the performance redeemed whatever the stage presentation lacked. The public remains stolid, even to the blandishments of a 'star' performance of 'Traviata,' under Mascagni.

CONDUCTORS AND ORCHESTRAL NOVELTIES

Clemens Krauss, whose rapid rise as conductor of the Staatsoper last season led to his appointment as director of the Frankfort Opera, has retained the Tonkünstler orchestral series jointly with Hans Knappertsbusch, the director of the Munich Opera. Krauss's noble—if at times all too controlled—conducting has won many admirers for him in his native city. His novelties of the season so far included Erich Korngold's 'Sinfonietta,' a grateful piece of music built largely on a theme which Korngold himself has termed 'the motive of the joyful heart,' and which recurs in many of his earlier compositions. Krauss's second new work was a piece, 'Variations on a Tragic Tale,' by E. N. von Reznicek. It is programme music in the style of the younger Strauss, as he spoke in 'Till Eulenspiegel.'

Knappertsbusch introduced us to the Variations, Op. 45, of Clemens Baron Frankenstein, who holds the post of Intendant, and is Knappertsbusch's superior at the Danish Opera. The Variations bear the impress of the Munich school of the late 'nineties as embodied in Ludwig Thuille and his colleagues, but they lack individuality. The newer German style—that of 1914, which drew its decisive characteristics from the Straussian example—was embodied in a 'Music for Orchestra,' by Rudi Stephan, a composer whom Germany still regards very highly. He died, adolescent, in the war. Rudolf Siegel, from Crefeld, introduced Stephan's work to a Vienna public, and did equally valuable service to a 'Phantastic Night Music,' by Ernst Toch. The last-named piece is apparently an earlier example, and less interesting or original, than Toch's recent chamber music. While Stephan's piece is elegiac in mood, Toch aims at more bizarre effects in a score which depicts the feverish visions of a sleepless dream.

Paul von Klenau, the Danish conductor, who is shortly to be heard in London, conducted works of his own at a special concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra. In 'Die Weise von Liebe und Tod des Cornets Christoph Rilke'—a large work for chorus, baritone solo, and orchestra, founded on Rainer Maria Rilke's descriptive poem—Klenau adds a wealth of romantically attractive melodies to the story, but does not succeed in overcoming its excessive length and diffuseness. There followed three orchestral fantasies on Dante's 'Inferno.' The second of these, entitled 'Paolo and Francesca,' excels in passages of lyrical beauty. The first, 'Descent into Hell,' and the third, 'Ugolino,' are impressive and picturesque, but their dramatic concept is not convincing. Klenau invests Dante with the orchestral colours of Liszt and Berlioz, and his visions of the Inferno are tempered by an essentially lyrical disposition.

The first presentation, in concert form, of Weber's opera, 'Die drei Pintos,' in Gustav Mahler's arrangement, was a notable event. To be quite correct, Mahler's share in the work exceeds the limits of a mere arrangement—it is really a new edifice which Mahler has built on Weber's foundation. In 1887, Capt. Weber, the composer's grandson, entrusted Mahler with the task of making a complete opera of Weber's sketches and manuscript notes, and within a week Mahler succeeded in producing the complete orchestral score. Only the second of the three Acts and smaller portions of the first Act are Weber's own work. For the rest, Mahler drew on Weber's sketches and other less-known Weber compositions. The outcome of Mahler's efforts is an opera which is so homogeneous as to make it difficult to distinguish Weber's own music from Mahler's additions to it. The performance, under Gottfried Kassowitz, a talented pupil of Alban Berg, was creditable, notwithstanding that the orchestra consisted entirely of semi-professionals.

CHAMBER MUSIC AND SOLOISTS

The Buxbaum Quartet has a new leader in the person of Robert Pollak, the well-known violinist who has frequently appeared with success in London and elsewhere, and his long experience as a chamber music player proves a stimulating element in this organization. The first novelty which the combination produced this season was Alexander von Zemlinsky's new String Quartet, Op. 16, which shows this musician in a new and splendid light. A certain eclecticism and lack of originality so often evident in Zemlinsky's music has here given way to spontaneity and vigour, without impairing the qualities of culture and intellect that have ever been a distinguishing feature of his compositions. A multiplicity of colouring which draws upon the instruments to their utmost capacity makes the new Quartet intensely interesting. Apart from the Scherzo, with its mysterious and swiftly-gliding mezzo-tints, the work is imbued with a certain melancholy and pensiveness which are an integral part of the composer's musical personality.

Two concerts of new Russian music inaugurated by the Soviet Government under the supervision of Prof. Victor Belaieff, of Moscow, were anticipated as manifestations of the latent revolutionary tendencies in contemporary musical production. But apart from a very erudite and effective Pianoforte Sonata, on classical lines, by Nicolas Miaskovsky, the music was on the whole only mediocre. The influence of Stravinsky and Prokofiev, or even of Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakov, was vainly looked for in a Quartet, Op. 2, by Basil Schirinsky, two songs by Anatol Alexandrov, and a 'Caprice Hebraique' by Alexander Krein. The Caprice is pure virtuoso music in the manner of a Sarasate or Wieniawsky. These young Russian composers, it would seem, attempt to continue where Tchaikovsky ended, and modern tendencies, or indeed revolutionary ideas, do not appear to enter into their conscience.

There seems little doubt that the composers heard on this occasion were not the representative figures of modern Russian music. Nor would it be just, indeed, to judge modern English music exclusively by the songs of Roger Quilter, which Mark Raphael, announced as a baritone from London, presented at his Vienna recital with the assistance of the composer at the pianoforte. They are nice and appealing specimens of smooth and cultivated salon music, and the interpretative style of Mr. Raphael—who is apparently a Russian—is quite suited to this sort of music.

Paul Bechert.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

William Townsend, at Edinburgh, at the age of seventy-five. He studied at the Royal Academy of Music for three years, and afterwards at Leipsic, returning to Edinburgh when about twenty. He was one of the original members, and latterly an honorary member, of the Edinburgh Society of Musicians, and in his prime was well-known as a soloist. For fifty-five years he was actively engaged in teaching. Gifted not only with a keen musical sense but with an acute intellect, he was a notable exponent, yet his chief claim to fame is as a pioneer in modern pianoforte technique. The results of his discoveries are embodied in the series of books published by Messrs. Bosworth a quarter of a century ago, the first of which was called 'Balance of Arm in Pianoforte Technique'—a term which he was the first to use. His results are incorporated (usually without acknowledgment) in the leading 'methods' of to-day. Arm-balance, the cycloidal wrist-motion, the recognition of the part played by the whole arm and not merely by the fingers in good tone-production, the accurate study of the contact of fingers with key, eliminating the evil results of pressure after the finger has done its work, and so on—these and other principles which he enunciated are among the commonplaces of to-day.

FRANCIS E. BARRETT, music critic to the Morning Post, on January 19. His father, Dr. W. A. Barrett, joint author of Stainer and Barrett's 'Dictionary of Musical Terms,' was himself music critic to the Morning Post for many years, and the connection of father and son with the journal lasted from 1865 to the present year. Francis Barrett was respected for the firmness of his judgment and for the authority of his views on operatic performance. He was a strong supporter of the Competition Festival movement and municipal activity in music.

CHARLES E. TINNEY, on January 3, at Holmwood, East Grinstead. He was born at Pimlico on March 15, 1851, and made his first appearance at a Royal Academy concert at St. James's Hall in 1876. For twenty-five years he was vicar-choral at St. Paul's Cathedral. He taught for a time at the New England Conservatoire of Music, Boston, sang at concerts in Buenos Ayres, and since 1900 had been professor at the Guildhall School of Music and the Royal Irish Academy of Music, Dublin.

JAMES W. COLEMAN, at Chiswick, on December 20. Since his youth he had served as organist and choirmaster at various churches, his last appointment being at St. Mary's, Kilburn. During the war his choir, eighty strong, gave over four hundred concerts to wounded soldiers, and for this piece of good work he received the O.B.E.

JOHN HARMAN JUDD, at Lower Edmonton, on December 28. He was born on March 5, 1847, and for fifty-five years was organist at Christ Church, Southgate, resigning in 1920, but continuing his connection in an honorary capacity. (The house in which he lived, Lamb's Cottage, Edmonton, was that occupied by the essayist.)

KENNETH MACKINLAY, the younger brother of Miss Jean Sterling Mackinlay. A musician of considerable attainments, he was satisfied to place his career at the service of his sister, with whom he formed an artistic partnership as accompanist. (Attention is called to a letter on p. 159.)

Answers to Correspondents

Questions must be of general musical interest. They must be stated simply and briefly, and if several are sent, each must be written on a separate slip. We cannot undertake to reply by post.

R. J. R.—You wish to know how to 'get going' as a concert singer 'without incurring expense'; you cannot afford further study; you have been 'let down badly by so-called agents'; you see other singers getting plenty of engagements without advertising; in short, 'how do I get known'?—The question is both easy and difficult. The successful singers you speak of don't advertise in print to any great extent; their publicity methods are far better. Every time they sing in public they advertise themselves in the most convincing way — in fact, the only way that counts for much in the long run. But how to make a start? Well; you say you are already a soloist in a professional West-End choir; you have sung at a few concerts in the same favoured part of London; and you have broadcast. Surely, with this experience you can obtain credentials with which to approach a few conductors and concert-givers with a request for an interview and a hearing. Have you tried the Sunday League? If your attainments are as good as you say, you ought to have no difficulty in using your present engagements as helps to others. There is no other way, failing the long purse that enables aspirants to give vocal recitals or send out gramophone records of their singing. Reinald Werrenrath, the well-known American singer, recently discussed this question with an interviewer. Here is his summing-up:

> 'Of course, you have your disappointments. But you don't stop to brood over them. You sing at one place, and then you're asked to sing at another; you get a boost here and a roast there; you work and work; you just work into a career. And presently you're all dated up, and you say, "Oho! I'm getting along!" Up to that you were just hoping to be able to pay your bills.'

That's all there is to it! You sing at one place, and if that doesn't lead to your being asked to sing at another, it might be worth your while to do a bit of hard thinking as to your capabilities.

GUIDA.—In preparing staccato 6ths (wrist staccato) for the Intermediate Grade, Associated Board Examinations, first realise that in wrist staccato the operating agent is the hand swinging freely from the wrist. There is no independent movement of the fingers, and the upper arm and forearm are both held stationary. For cultivating the correct action, before playing scales practise repeated 6ths. Swinging loosely from the wrist, allow the hand to fall lightly on the keys without depressing them—over the interval of a 6th. Keeping the arm steady, raise the hand an inch or two above the keys, then immediately allow it to drop lightly on the same notes, resting for a moment and feeling the keys before depressing them. Imagine you are playing on a hot plate, and allow the keys to ascend the instant sound is produced, carrying the hand with them, and sending it upwards like a bouncing ball. Without allowing the hand to remain stationary in the air, repeat the operation several times. The points to emphasise are: (a) it must be a hand movement freely operating from the wrist; (b) it is important to rest momentarily on the keys before depressing them. The keys must not be hit. With practice, the downward swing of the hand, the momentary resting, and the descent of the key become one continuous movement. In practising the scale, the upward swing is reduced to a minimum. To attain speed, the aim should be to get the fingers in contact with the next pair of notes as quickly as possible. Play the first 6th as staccato as possible, and allow the rebounding key to bounce the hand as in a flash over the next pair of notes. Rest on these for a moment before depressing them, and proceed similarly throughout the scale. Keep fingers well curved, and be careful that the stretch required for the interval of a 6th remains unaltered.

PETER PAN.—(1.) Some years ago we used the 'Plex' duplicator for making copies of music. So far as we remember it was satisfactory. No doubt a cyclostyle would answer the purpose, too. (2.) The advice as to pedalling the bass of hymn-tunes at the written pitch, and not an octave below, is quite sound, and is based on three reasons: (a) The practice of pedalling an octave lower almost invariably leads to the shape of the bass part being spoilt by the frequent necessity for playing loco for a few notes when the 8ve would be beyond the compass of the pedal board; (b) as the 16-ft. tone of the pedal is already doubling the vocal bass in the lower octave, the ear has all it wants (sometimes more) in the way of deep tone; (c) pedalling hymn-basses at the right pitch provides excellent practice. But, of course, if your organ (as you say) has no open 16-ft. on the pedals, and no doubles on the manuals, you might well add to its gravity and power by pedalling hymns an octave lower. But see that your bass remains shapely. (3.) What you say of the low standard of hymns used at anniversary services may be true, but we believe that recent years have seen a marked improvement. We think you will find some of the later issues of 'Novello's Sunday School Anniversary Series' worth your attention.

H. VOM DORP (BARMEN).—No book of biographical sketches of the Church musicians you name is to be had, so far as we can ascertain. Articles dealing with some of them have appeared in this journal from time to time, as follows: Sir Frederick Bridge, August, 1897; Stanford, December, 1898; Sir George Martin, July, 1897; Sir Walter Parratt, July, 1902; Sir Hubert Parry, July, 1898; and Sydney Nicholson, September, 1918. Copies of these can be had of the publishers. Of the other books you inquire about, 'A History of English Cathedral Music,' by John S. Bumpus, is out of print; W. A. Barrett's 'English Church Composers' is published by Sampson Low. A work that is a mine of information on the subject is John E. West's 'Cathedral Organists' (Novello, 7*s.*). It gives practically all that is known of the older generations of cathedral and collegiate organists, with biographical details of their successors up to date. The work came out in a new edition a year or two ago. Henry Davey's 'History of English Music' contains much of interest on the subject (Curwen, 25*s.*), and we need hardly say that Sir Frederick Bridge's autobiography 'A Westminster Pilgrim' is a store-house of information concerning church music and musicians of his period (Novello, 10*s.* 6*d.*).

A. B. C.—(1.) Don't arrange your choir-boys according to height; you might as reasonably consider the colour of their hair in placing them! Make the top seats honourable, and worth every boy's ambition. (2.) In monotoning, basses who sing falsetto ought to use their natural voice, and recite at the same pitch as the basses and tenors. (3.) Those boys with cracked voices who sing alto! And you say you are 'not allowed to get rid of any boy, however useless'! A very absurd regulation on the part of the ecclesiastical authority, but happily it must sooner or later be upset by the difficulty of finding accommodation for your veteran trebles. Anyway, if you don't feel equal to putting your foot down as to who should or should not remain in the choir on purely musical grounds, nobody can help you. (4.) In Mendelssohn's first Organ Sonata, bar 2, there is no E♯ in the copy of the Novello edition we have consulted.

G. H. S.—(1.) Settings of the 'Te Deum' on the lines of Wesley's Chant Service in F are by J. L. Hopkins, J. Stainer, G. M. Garrett, and E. Vine Hall, all published by Novello in the Parish Choir Book series. (2.) If you know 'all Rheinberger's short pieces' you are pretty well provided with short voluntaries, as they number nearly a hundred. Add to them the slow movements of Mendelssohn's Sonatas; such of Bach's Chorale Preludes as suit your purpose; Gade's 'Three Pieces'; the short pieces of John E. West; the 'Twenty-four Pieces in Free Style' of Louis Vierne; Boëllmann's Twelve Pieces; and the two sets of Preludes by Alan Gray (Augener). These will, we hope, give you sufficient material to go on with. All may be had from Novello, except the Gray pieces.

F. P.—We know of no library of gramophone records, though we believe some public libraries are considering the feasibility of starting a section of the kind. But there are obvious difficulties. The life of a gramophone record is short beside that of a book; records need careful storing and handling, and however careful the library staff may be, there is no guarantee as to the borrower. Neither is there in the case of a book, you say. True, but the damage to a book must be very serious in order to prevent its being read, whereas a scratch or a slight warp is enough to ruin a record. And the damage to a book can be seen, whereas that to a record is not always visible. The way out is for a few friends to arrange among themselves to club and exchange records.

SELF-TEACHER.—(1.) 'Harmony,' by Kitson (Oxford Press); 'Counterpoint,' by Bridge (Novello) and 'Applied Counterpoint,' by Kitson (Oxford Press). (2.) If you 'can't imagine the tone of any instrument' no book is likely to help you. Keep pegging away, developing your mental hearing by trying to remember the sound of chords and simple progressions, checking your mental hearing by playing the progressions on the pianoforte. When you go to a concert, try at the close of a work to reproduce mentally any tone-colour or effect that has just been heard. After all, you can (we suppose) hear in your mind the sounds of words or any such effects as the barking of a dog, the banging of a door, &c. If you can do this, you ought to have no difficulty in developing the same faculty in regard to musical sounds.

S. S.—(1.) Take the advice of your teacher as to which operatic work you should purchase with a view to study. The difficulty of editions varying in regard to text is inevitable. You must be prepared to make such manuscript corrections as are necessary. We do not know what edition of the stock operas is used by the B.N.O.C. Even if you could find out, the knowledge would not help you much, as you may be sure the translation has been modified a good deal in course of time. (2.) The Musical Times may be had in bound yearly volumes, price 11*s.* 6*d.*

FIDICEN.—(1.) The harp is not considered a very difficult instrument to play. A pianist would find its mastery fairly easy, for the stretch required is not so great as that for the pianoforte. (2.) It is possible for a student to be self-taught, but it would be advisable to take a few good lessons, so as to avoid the development of wrong methods. (3.) The price you mention may or may not be reasonable for the second-hand harp; all depends on its condition. You should get competent advice before purchasing an instrument.

A. S. M.—You ask for a 'method' of finding out if your fingers are stiff. A simple matter: Are they free and flexible at the keyboard? If not, they are stiff. The cure? Plenty of thoughtful finger-work, with frequent simple relaxation exercises—e.g., strike a plain triad, hold it, and then relax without releasing the keys. Another: strike an octave with one hand, hold the thumb-note and relax; the little finger will then leave its key and naturally draw towards the thumb. This exercise may be reversed of course. Make up others off your own bat.

F. W.—To give English versions of German titles of your list of Chorale Preludes would take far more space than can be spared. The Novello Edition of Bach's Organ Works, vol. 20, contains all the Chorales used by Bach in his Preludes, with English translations of the hymns, or at least the first verse. For a full understanding of these works you need more than a knowledge of the meaning of the mere title.

G. G. C.—Another one who 'wishes to be a composer'! We are glad you are prepared to study with that end in view. Keep that frame of mind, and don't be led astray by any prospects of easy success that your 'talent for melodic invention' may open up. Work at the following: 'Harmony,' Kitson (Oxford University Press); 'Composition,' Stanford (Stainer & Bell); 'Outlines of Musical Form,' Ham (Novello); 'Harmony Exercises,' Adam Carse (Augener).

IGNORANT.—(1.) The letters which puzzle you have nothing to do with form. They merely serve to divide the music into sections for purposes of rehearsal. Without such guides the performers would be unable to stop and restart without a lot of wasted time in counting bars. (2.) We have asked some A.R.C.M. examiners about the test you mention, but they don't identify it. Have you misread the syllabus?

A. Z.—Wanted: a half-dozen suggestions as to poems or other material suitable for you to set as a Mus. Bac. Exercise. We think it far better that you should do a bit of hunting for yourself. Surely you have not got so far on the road to a degree without picking up a good working knowledge of English literature! If you have, a long search for a text will do you good. As a last resource, you may fall back on the Psalms of David.

L. W. W.—The key-signatures of plainsong notation are two only—F and B (flat). Regard them as Dohs, and in translating into modern notation, choose the key that suits your purpose best, and regard its key-note as the Doh of the plainsong. Remember that the plainsong notation is on the movable Doh system, thus reducing ledger lines to a minimum.

D. V. C.—Broadcasting does not bar a singer from concert engagements unless (1) the singer is under agreement with an agent not to broadcast, or (2) the concert is given by an organization that taboos singers who broadcast. But seeing how many hundreds of singers are busy both in concert-hall and broadcasting station, you need have no qualms.

T. C.—Dunstan's 'Cyclopædic Dictionary of Music' (Curwen, 17*s.* 6*d.*) includes a good many French expressions—enough for your purpose, we should imagine. But as the examination is a difficult one, we presume you are working with a teacher. If so, consult him on the point.

H. E. W.—Write to Messrs. Novello for a selection of Motets of the kind you want. They may be had on approval, and you may then choose them at your leisure. This is a more satisfactory method than letting us choose for you.

R. G. S. (NORWICH).—We have inquired about music for the piano-accordion, but in vain. Can any reader tell us where music for the instrument can be obtained?

B. P. H.—Ask the advice of the particular R.A.M. professor whose disciple you say you are. He could give you more information than we can.

CHORALES

HARMONIZED BY

JOHANN SEBASTIAN BACH

COLLECTED AND ARRANGED IN MELODIC ORDER

BY

H. ELLIOT BUTTON

This Collection of Chorales harmonized by Bach contains, it is believed, all those that he arranged for voices. It includes also an Index by means of which any Chorale can easily be found if the first few notes of the melody are known.

Price ... ... Cloth, Ten Shillings and Sixpence

SOME PRESS OPINIONS

DAILY TELEGRAPH

"The task of making this noble collection has been undertaken by Mr. H. Elliot Button, who has made the volume particularly useful to organists and choirmasters by arranging the chorales in melodic order and providing an ingenious Melodic Index by means of which a particular Chorale may be found in a moment. Organists, indeed, may find themselves in clover by exploring the latest publications of this house."

BIRMINGHAM POST

"The compiler of this volume is H. Elliot Button, who has made an ingenious musical index based on the first note of each melody. The system also allows of all the harmonizations of a melody being kept together, and the student of Bach will find this an extremely interesting volume."

DAILY MAIL

"Mr. H. Elliot Button is a hard and conscientious worker on behalf of music. His research work is invaluable, and his latest work of compilation has resulted in the collection of 'Chorales Harmonized by Johann Sebastian Bach' which appears to be the first complete and comprehensive edition in one volume . . . . The Melodic Index which Mr. Button has introduced, in addition to the usual indices, shows remarkable ingenuity. By recourse to this unique invention no difficulty is experienced in immediately satisfying one's requirements . . . . There is evidence of great painstaking labour in this work, and apart from its value as a work of reference, the collection is redolent of melodic and harmonic wealth which will be found useful by pianists and organists for many and varied purposes."

YORKSHIRE POST

"The chorales are most clearly printed on good paper, and the book is one that will commend itself to all church organists."

ABERDEEN PRESS AND JOURNAL

"A complete and reliable collection of chorales harmonized by Bach has long been needed. It now appears in a handsome edition published by Novello. No longer need the student laboriously plough through the oratorios, the cantatas, and the motets in search of the various harmonizations of this or that chorale. He will find them all in Mr. Button's book, together with those chorales used by Bach in works no longer extant, but which have been accepted as authentic upon the evidence of Bach's greatest son . . . . The present volume is invaluable; to the student a real boon, and a source of endless pleasure.

SUNDAY MERCURY

Messrs. Novello have given to the world a wonderful book. J. S. Bach was, is, and ever will remain the most wonderful of all the great masters. The book is collected and arranged in melodic order by H. Elliot Button, who has indeed done the work with competence and amazing thoroughness."

YORKSHIRE HERALD

"The collection is admirably arranged; a chronological index of titles, an ingenious melodic index, invented by the author, combined with excellent type and binding make it a handsome volume."

TABLET

"Mr. Elliot Button has become our benefactor in giving us a fine folio edition of the Bach chorales on a very convenient plan. The melodic index is so contrived that even when you have completely forgotten the words of a particular chorale it is soon hunted down. This well-printed volume is handsomely bound in cloth gilt."

CHURCH TIMES

"The Bach lover will be delighted to add this fine compilation to his music library."

This latest addition to the famous series of Star Folios has justly been hailed as the most notable of the whole output, and indeed it represents a greater publishing achievement, if such be possible, than any of its predecessors. For here is arrayed in a form never before available to the pianist seven of the best-known Symphonies by Beethoven, Haydn, Mendelssohn, and Mozart—wonderful masterpieces that stand for all time as a monument to the power of good music. Whereas years ago the public were apt to be afraid of the word "symphony" as implying something so extremely classical as to be beyond their comprehension, the extent to which extracts from symphonies are played by cinema orchestras, &c., nowadays has brought home to the people the knowledge that contained in these symphonies are some of the loveliest gems of melody ever composed. No expense or trouble has been spared in compiling this unique volume, which should undoubtedly find its way into the libraries of all pianists, amateur and professional alike.

Optional parts for 1st and Obligato Violins, also 'Cello, are published and should prove useful for home study, concert or cinema performance. Both parts are fully cued.

OLD ENGLISH

VIOLIN MUSIC

EDITED BY

ALFRED MOFFAT.

PREFATORY NOTE.

Although considerable attention has been given to the resuscitation of Church Music, Glees and Madrigals, Organ and even Harpsichord Music by the older English composers, very little has been done to make known the large mass of music for the Violin written by English musicians from the time of Purcell to the close of the 18th century. These works for the most part consist of Suites or Sonatas written for a solo violin with a figured bass, or for two violins and violoncello with a figured bass for the harpsichord or organ; another favourite form was the Concerto grosso.

It is with the object of making known to the public a selection of the best of these compositions that the present series has been undertaken. ALFRED MOFFAT.

TWO NEW PIANO PIECES

E. J. MOERAN

TOCCATA
PRICE 3s. NET.

STALHAM RIVER
PRICE 2s. NET.

"E. J. Moeran's "Toccata" is a brilliant affair, very difficult, but well worth the labour involved. It has thematic interest, too, in the shape of themes that clearly owe a good deal to folk-song. The composer shows a fine brilliance suitable to the toccata type and in a matter of rich sonority. The harmony is full of interest, but never far-fetched. "Stalham River" is no less successful in a different way. Both pieces are for first-rate players, and both recall John Ireland, especially the Toccata. Mr. Moeran is a composer who will be worth watching, if we may judge from these pieces."—The Musical Times.

That very common fault—

"STIFFNESS"—IS IMPOSSIBLE.

"One cannot develop bad habits under your system, and the pianist's most common fault and stumbling block, "STIFFNESS," is impossible."—Extract from a pupil's letter.

MAKE 1925 A YEAR OF REAL PROGRESS.

As a pianist, student, or teacher, what are you doing? You cannot afford to stand still—YOU must be abreast of the times—YOUR playing and teaching must be on MODERN PROGRESSIVE LINES—the solution for EVERY DIFFICULTY must be at your finger tips.

How often has some difficulty presented itself to you, and you have wished to discuss it with an expert?

HERE IS YOUR OPPORTUNITY.

THE CHARLES A. GILLETT SPECIALISED CORRESPONDENCE LESSONS IN MODERN PIANOFORTE PLAYING will help you in every conceivable difficulty. Its success cannot be doubted in the face of the numerous letters of appreciation received from Mus. Docs., Mus. Bacs., and others of all degrees. THOROUGHNESS and EXPLICITLY DETAILED INSTRUCTION are the GUIDING CHARACTERISTICS.

Every earnest pianist should at any rate keep an open mind as to the efficiency of these Courses until he investigates them—he will then be firmly convinced that Mr. Gillett's methods are quite unique.

Many valuable and important additions have now been made to the Charles A. Gillett Correspondence Course in Modern Pianoforte Playing. This now forms a most perfect method for the busy teacher, amateur or professional student.

MR. CHARLES A. GILLETT RECEIVES PUPILS FOR PRIVATE LESSONS AND CONSULTATIONS AT HIS STUDIOS.

MODERN CORR. COLLEGE

Principal: ARTHUR McALISTER, B.A. (CANTAB.).

MATRICULATION. SUCCESSES ... 119.

The Principal has an intimate knowledge of the requirements of the Examiners, and undertakes to prepare a student in from three to four months. If you have lost touch with the work, we can soon get you on the right lines. A student writes: "When I think that after a lapse of twenty years I was enabled by your course to pass Matriculation in four months, I am more than grateful." A student who passed, January, 1925, writes: "I sat once before in June, 1924, before taking lessons with you, and failed hopelessly. My success this time is entirely due to your very sound coaching, and I hope to take further lessons from you shortly."

1ST MUS. BAC.

The standard of this examination is high, but the difficulties can be surmounted if a student work on the right lines. At a recent examination, nearly 50% of the entire pass list were students of the M.C.C., which is sufficient testimony to the soundness of our methods. The two essentials are style and speed, both of which qualities can be acquired by working through the M.C.C. Course.

EXERCISE (MUS. BAC.).

No Exercise will be accepted by the Examiners unless it is written in a modern idiom. Students who are unacquainted with modern methods, are advised to take up our special preparatory course in Composition.

MUS. BAC. GUARANTEE COURSE.

This course has become very popular, and the reasons are obvious. For One Fee, which can be paid by instalments, tuition is given until the Degree is gained. No time-limit is imposed, and extra work can be sent during vacation. Students who take up the Guarantee Course receive a preliminary course in Harmony, Counterpoint, and Composition, concurrently with the Matriculation course, which enables a student to gain the Degree in the shortest possible time. Tuition is given for Durham, London, Dublin.

A.R.C.O., F.R.C.O. RECENT SUCCESSES ... 27.

Testimony from a young student.

A student, aged sixteen years, passed A.R.C.O., January, 1925. He writes: "Please convey to the A.R.C.O. Tutor my best thanks for his invaluable help and unfailing courtesy."

SUCCESS AT THE FIFTH ATTEMPT (A.R.C.O.).

A student fails four times under other tuition, and passes after a four months' course with the M.C.C.

NEW REGULATIONS (A.R.C.O., F.R.C.O.).

Special papers have been prepared, covering completely the new regulations. Speed is an important factor at these examinations, and unless a student is trained on the right lines he has no chance of success. A candidate must possess the ability to seize on the essential features of a particular test, and must show sound musicianship. The M.C.C. Tutors will show you how to analyse a test and how to utilise to the best its rhythmical possibilities.

A. MUS. T.C.L.

This examination is entirely theoretical, and affords an excellent preliminary to Mus. Bac. A.R.C.O. students are reminded that they can gain this diploma by passing in the Art of Teaching only. High marks are invariably gained by M.C.C. students, as the following results indicate: Counterpoint, 94%; History, 93%; Rudiments, 100%.

A.T.C.L. (Pianoforte).

At a recent examination a student gained 86% "Art of Teaching."

L.R.A.M., A.R.C.M., L.T.C.L. (Pianoforte Teaching).

In addition to carefully prepared papers on Form, Harmony, Phrasing, &c., detailed notes are sent on the pieces chosen by the candidate for the practical tests.

The Course deals with the following points:

1. Melodic and Harmonic structure of the pieces.
2. Kinds of touch to be employed, with examples.
3. Use of Rubato, with illustrations.
4. Notes on part-playing.
5. Analysis of the form of each piece.
6. How to practise the set pieces.
7. Balance of tone, especially with reference to the subject and counter-subject in the Fugue.
8. Where to broaden the tone.
9. How to render the shakes.
10. How to avoid harsh tone in playing large skips.
11. Method of fingering difficult passages.

NOTE.—This course has been written by TEACHERS for TEACHERS, and is essentially of a practical nature.

L.R.A.M., A.R.C.M., L.T.C.L. (Elocution and Singing).

Each course consists of twenty lessons, and embodies the principles of the chief writers on the subjects. It will prove very valuable not only to the student with an examination in view, but to all teachers.

(Paper Work)

L.R.A.M. (S. VIII. and IX.); A.R.C.M. (S. XIII.).

These are ideal subjects for class teachers.

SPECIAL SERVICE DEPARTMENT.

This has been organized to deal with difficulties arising out of the private work of the teacher. Teachers preparing students for Trinity College and Associated Board examinations can receive detailed notes on Form, Touch, Phrasing, Pedalling, &c. Teachers who wish to avail themselves of this help, are requested to send details of requirements.

REVISION OF COMPOSITIONS.

All kinds of compositions criticised, revised, and prepared for publication. Songs, pianoforte pieces, anthems, services, part-songs, cantatas, and orchestral works. Melodies harmonized and compositions arranged for full orchestra.

TUITION IN SINGLE SUBJECTS.

Please state examination or subject interested in.

DO YOU ENJOY PLAYING FROM MEMORY?

Or do you experience that most unhappy sensation at the end of your performance—a feeling of "regrets"? . . . "What a pity I made that silly mistake." . . . "I do wish I had not bungled that one passage." . . . "Why do things never come off at a concert as well as they do when I am practising?"

If you do not memorise the right way, you feel that your memory is not absolutely safe, which makes you just sufficiently nervous to take the edge off your enjoyment in playing.

You can be sure of attaining that sense of certainty, that knowing that there is no risk of forgetting or breaking down, if you memorise your music by

MR. ALBERT GARCIA

LESSONS IN VOICE PRODUCTION AND SINGING

Special Coaching in Opera, Oratorio, and for Recitals.
Pupils prepared for A.R.C.M. and L.R.A.M. Exams.

"A number of Mr. Albert Garcia's pupils sang excellently at the concert which they gave on Wednesday evening. It was particularly pleasant to hear voices so well placed and well poised, smooth and even in tone from the lowest to the highest notes, showing a control which too few learn to exercise."—Daily Telegraph.

"One takes it that a concert by pupils fulfils its object if it demonstrates—as the one given at Wigmore Hall by Singers studying with Mr. Albert Garcia certainly did—the excellence of that master's method."—Era.

"Mr. Garcia—himself a fine artist and inheritor of a great tradition and a great name—has some most promising pupils, and such singers as Miss Rosa Burn and Mr. Frederick Lippold show in what an excellent school they have been trained."—Daily Telegraph.

Complete in six correspondence lessons, the Course provides a scientific and absorbing method by which any pianist or organist, even though totally unable to memorise at present, can acquire a thoroughly reliable musical memory.

Fifteen minutes daily is all the practice required. Teachers, students, professional musicians can take the Course without interfering with their daily work. Age is no drawback. The Course has achieved equal success with pianists of of 17 to 70!

There are no special papers to be answered—no extra music need be bought. Each lesson can be applied at once to the Music you are studying, with instant and gratifying results.

Send coupon below for free booklet giving full particulars and numerous testimonials.

MACKINNON'S

MUSICAL MEMORY COURSE

FOR PIANISTS

EMPIRE HOUSE, 175 PICCADILLY, W.1.

IN SIX POSTAL LESSONS - FEE, £3:3:0

GUARANTEE.

You risk nothing in taking the Course, for under this guarantee your money is returned if you fail to make immediate progress.

If within four weeks of the receipt of the first lesson, and before the receipt of the second, any student should find that no progress has been made as a result of taking the course, Miss Mackinnon will unconditionally refund all fees received from such student.

Two typical letters received last month:

(a) "I am very pleased with the results. I have surprised a few of my friends who thought I could not play from memory. The instructions are so simply and clearly put that I don't think it is possible to fail."

(b) "I am finding the lessons invaluable, and am astonished at the confidence they give one. May I be added to the many who, I am sure, owe much and real gratitude to Miss Mackinnon for her extraordinarily clever and wise ideas."

THE "DISCUS"
REG[D].

ORGAN BLOWER

THE QUIET EFFICIENCY OF THE "DISCUS"—

Blower is largely responsible for its widespread adoption in Cathedrals and Churches at home and abroad. Nearly a thousand are now in use. Apart from its quietness of working the "Discus" is a very attractive financial proposition. It saves the wages of a blower, and gives the organist the opportunity for rehearsal at all times. Any organ, large or small, can be fitted with the "Discus," and the motive power may be either electric motor, gas, or oil engine. Constructed of metal throughout, well designed and of the best workmanship. Its reliability and efficiency are guaranteed.

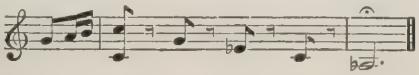
MENTAL PERSPECTIVE IN MUSIC

Many of my readers must have said of a heap of different works in turn, just after they had heard each one, 'this is the biggest thing in all music,' thereby discovering, not their own fickleness, but their own mental perspective. The mental is of course for all of us linked up with, and continually affected by the physical perspective—often severely (though not totally) conditioned by it. The mother-wit of the old saying 'out of sight, out of mind' applies obviously to music. 'Out of earshot, out of mind' is the same instructive but partial truth to us as the original saying is to the artist or to the lover; that is, it is true, but only as true as we choose to have it; for of course the mental eye or ear can easily see things out of sight and hear things out of earshot. Indeed in listening to a sonata it is absolutely necessary to be able to call to mind things unheard. While we are in the act of physically listening to the phrase sounded, we must be able mentally to recall the absent phrase. In the 'Waldstein' Sonata, for example, this remark:

Ex. 1.



gets its very force from the existence of the previous straightforward statement:

actually heard four or five minutes earlier. Unless this latter is still on our mental horizon, Beethoven's lovely after-play with it is lost to us; indeed, we miss his whole point. Beethoven's use of physical perspective was more vivid and eloquent, perhaps, than any other composer's. Think of his startling fortissimo foregrounds and his mystic pianissimo distances, notably in the string-writing in the Symphonies. But he was also the most vividly aware of mental perspective of any composer we can think of, and amazingly skilful and considerate of his hearers in using it. I need only remind the reader, for example, of the boisterous C sharp, which seems to leap out of his picture in the Finale of the Eighth Symphony, and then of the delightful and mischievous play of thought he has deduced from it later on. His remark that he 'always composed to a picture' is noteworthy, especially in view of the fact that no composer depended less upon programme or Malerei. Can he possibly have meant that he always purposely studied the intensely real thing whose clumsy name is di-auscultation? It sometimes looks like it, and it would certainly account for his unique command of an attentive ear from ordinary men.

In any case, whether it was one of the secrets of Beethoven's appeal or whether it is an open secret to all the world,* it is, I am certain, urgently desirable to get a far more general musical hold of the principle, and I may be forgiven the attempt here to pursue the matter still a little further in order to try to offer a statement about it which the reader may easily improve for himself, and from which he may make his own guiding, practical deductions, from almost any angle of musical vision; for it should be remembered that one of the things that makes it hard to talk of mental perspective at all is the fact that, while our bodies have always to take their perspective from the one point where they find themselves at the moment, our minds can and do leap from point to point moment by moment and so change their whole perspective with each leap. (And if a million minds can take a million leaps a week, then—you may well exclaim—'Where are we?' Just where we were, gentle reader, and still able to share and discuss music as the most companionable of all joys; still able, standing mentally side by side, to see eye to eye or hear ear to ear, either with Bach himself or with John Smith, if only the music is of the clear, commanding kind.)

Now the primal fact to note seems to be this: mental perspective at any given moment must naturally apply to all ideas actually present to the mind at that moment, just as the physical perspective of the moment applies to all objects then present to the senses. If this be fact, or even if it be only acceptable hypothesis, then the following broad statement may safely be offered as a basis from which anyone may make his own useful deductions:

> Anything in a piece of music which brings ideas near to the mind of the hearer will necessarily cause those ideas to form his MENTAL FOREGROUND; while anything which causes ideas (characteristic chords, phrases, rhythms, &c.) to fade from the mind, or makes them seem less vividly present, less pressing upon our attention, will in its turn tend to put these ideas into the MENTAL BACKGROUND.

I have italicised this obvious sentence because of the apparently great importance of the principle it

* A friend has this morning sent me word of mention by Schumann, nearly a hundred years ago, of musical perspective.

expounds, and because of the innumerable practical consequences which seem to follow. To attempt an exhaustive list of its possible applications would be simply impudent. But on the other hand it may be useful if I venture to note a few effects, almost haphazard, gleaned from personal observation:

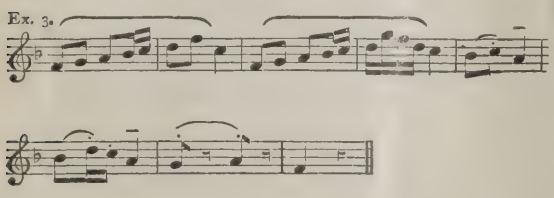
(1.) EFFECT OF PHRASES

Just as a very long pole held close to the eye cannot be seen as a whole, so the mind may fail to grasp a long musical phrase if held close to the ear, that is, played or sung noisily. Therefore, if a phrase is long and important, it should not be loudly or sensationally presented. If on the other hand you wish to place a phrase vividly in the very foreground of your hearer's mind, let it be concise, of a size that the hearer can take in and remember (alike in length, range, and loudness). Of course a phrase may be so ramblingly long as not to be heard as a whole at all, however remotely placed; or it may be too short to count. But the important point is this—the very long phrase will have its best chance if presented unsensationally to the mind, the very short one its best chance if presented vividly. This leads naturally to a second kindred point:

(2.) EFFECT OF RELATIVE SIZE

As the length of a phrase can determine its appropriate place in the hearer's mental field, so the relative lengths of the various phrases in any given musical picture seem actually to determine their relative positions in that field. This brings with it—apart from all other considerations—the possibility of formal musical vistas. It is perhaps better to suggest the analogy of architectural perspective here, though it is not to be pressed. Take the following simple form:

Ex. 3.



The two longer phrases will, I believe, naturally plant themselves down in the hearer's mental field in a different plane from that of the two next phrases; and, though he is totally unaware of it, a happy effect of mental perspective may result.

By way of crude analogous illustration: if upright lines of varying lengths be drawn on a blackboard, in almost any position in which the eye can relate them, then the shorter lines by comparison with the longer will very readily suggest receding distances to the mind, though they actually stand all on the same plane. It is dangerous to generalise from this, because a short line to the ear may be nearer the mind than a long line in the same plane of loudness—that is, it may actually suggest the very opposite of the receding distance always presented to the eye; nevertheless the principle remains the same, and the two short lines of the following characteristic fragment of the classical period:

may range themselves naturally at different points in our field of mental hearing by reason of their differing lengths, and thus influence our mental reception of the whole melody. The classical custom of building on the plan of two short phrases, then a long one; and the converse custom of answering four bars with four, then two with two, then carrying on in one-bar lengths, are both too well-known to need further illustration. They seemed to become a dangerously easy convention of a certain period. Beethoven's habits of perspective may be seen in a telling light by comparing his way of treating the first two bars of his first Pianoforte Sonata with Mozart's way in the first eight bars in the Finale of his G minor Symphony.

(3.) EFFECT OF MODULATION

But though such things as length, strength, shape, and relative position of phrases have perpetual influence upon the hearer's picture, his mental perspective seems most potently influenced or determined by the thing we call Modulation, where we pass in music from chords or groups of chords which are mentally near us to chords or groups of chords which are at the moment more remotely in our minds.

Possibly the whole explanation of the thing we call key in music, and of Bach's and Beethoven's devotion to it, and of the musical glories wrought by them within the limits of a fixed key system, may actually be found in this simple fact of mental perspective, or (in other words) of the fact that there must always be the fascination of infinitely variable distances in the mental musical field. And chords (or groups of chords) must always be either near or far in our listening minds.

We know there are many simple ways of taking up a mental stand upon any given chord called our key-chord or final. Emphasis will do it; repetition or recurrence will do it; bias will do it. This being granted, our minds are still quite free to move. They can always change their key-standing, their harmonic thought-centre or tonality, at will, and so in an instant change their whole mental vista; and they may do this any number of times in a given work. We may extol this power of instant movement to any point of thought, and call it by the powerful new name of omnitonality—a word which seems to [illegible] a gigantic mental claim Or we may on the other hand negate or disdain this power, under the new name of atonality. For my part, wherever I stand musically, I feel my mind necessarily retains a 'point of hearing,' from which point all related sounds will naturally group themselves. This suggests a wide, safe meaning for the abused and narrow word tonality, and makes the words omnitonality and atonality both look rather rash. Since one's mind is always somewhere, it soon rebels against both these terms. Omnitonality either puts forward too god-like, too omnipotent a claim musically, or it says in effect, 'My mind stands everywhere at the same time'—which is absurd. In the same way I for one rebel against atonality; it is to me a positively sensual term, because it seems to say, 'In music my mind stands nowhere in particular at any time, so here's for a jolly, unfettered revel in the unrelated riches of the chromatic scale, and all its fascinating kaleidoscopic possibilities, which are enough to keep me interested and busy.' If the terms omnitonal and atonal imply merely freedom to choose whether you will stand musically anywhere or nowhere at any given time, they discover a fairly obvious truth. But in using them it is well to keep in sight the fact that musical freedom comes only through mental mastery; and mastery involves clear thought; and this involves the common discipline of relating thought with thought; and surely musical discipline and devotion alone can relate to any clear purpose all the heavenly, new things in harmony that can possibly present themselves to one or more musical minds at any given moment.

ILLUSTRATIONS

In an already too protracted essay of explanation and surmise upon a big subject, there is but one way to call the reader's attention further to the amazing possibilities of mental and imaginative perspective in the harmonic field, and that is by quotation of some of the many examples, e.g., of Bach, Beethoven, and Schubert, who above most writers relied at great moments upon the harmonic 'near and far' to bring their own vision to their hearer's minds. The Editor has kindly allowed me to append a small supplement of examples from their works. I have chosen obvious examples, and marked with an asterisk the point at which the effect of remoteness or visionary distance seems notably to be achieved. This achievement, whenever it comes, seems to have exactly the effect upon the mind which far horizons have in the very loveliest scenery or pictures.

CONCLUSION

I shall hope to have the chance to discuss harmonic perspective further, both in its abstract and in its historic aspect. Meanwhile I must rest content with having quite inadequately drawn attention to it—not only, I hope, the attention of the general music-lover who reads his Musical Times, but also of my many fellow-pedagogues in music, companions who are jogging along what Shakespeare calls the 'foot-path way,' the way of teaching. Anything is to the good that will cause them to think, write, or speak with their pupils about so important a matter hitherto apparently so neglected, or at least so little apprehended or heeded that we have not even a word for it in any dictionary. Aural Perspective is really as ridiculous as visual Perauditive might have been if the position had been reversed and the painters were borrowing an idea from composers. Perhaps we shall have to adopt Prof. Rose's suggestion of di-audition or di-auscultation, which means the art of listening to a whole piece of music with discernment of the relative positions or values of the parts heard. Perhaps Diaudition will live to become the dictionary word.

Meanwhile the musicians who dispose their ideas on the canvas of time in most complete accord with the natural laws which determine the nearness or remoteness of appeal will be likely to get the New Music through to us first. When it comes it will be clear to our ears and indescribably welcome. In the same way, performers will find just ideas of musical distances in any piece helpful, perhaps indispensable, if they are to re-create the classics informed with their first inspiration—for, as performers, we either inform or deform the music in hand. We bring it into existence afresh each time, whether we will or no, either in its just proportions or disfigured. If Beethoven said he always wrote 'to a picture,' he should be played 'to a picture.' This need not mean anything fantastic or hard to attain. It means only that we must learn the rules of musical perspective or Diaudition. In short, we should diaudit all our musical accounts upon the pages of time whereon, by the very nature of things, all music has to be written by composers and rewritten by all performers—for good and all.

ON GOING BEHIND THE SCENES

By ALEXANDER BRENT-SMITH

Is there any man so entirely lacking in curiosity that he has no desire to go behind the scenes and find out how the trick is done? Such curiosity is common to all the higher types of animal life. It is not only the elephant's child that is driven by insatiable curiosity, as any one who lives in the country will admit. It is a well-known truth in agricultural circles that if you plant a young tree in a field, before you have had time to fence it round, a clumsy cow, prompted by a desire for knowledge, will have pushed it down, to discover, I suppose, how it managed to stand upright.

Recalling our own childish days, some of us can remember how we tearfully explained to our what-do-you-mean-faced nurse, who confronted us with a chaotic jumble of wheels, cogs, and intractable springs, that we had only been trying to find out how the engine worked. What unending joys had childhood then to offer us! What a delirious excitement it was to be allowed to go into the kitchen and watch the making of an apple-pie (generally a child's chief delight is in the execution of some useless but characteristic feature of the cookery, such as putting on the crinkly pastry round the edges of the pie, or affixing the panjandrumesque little button at the top).

What a fascinating occupation was that of a pianoforte-tuner, who opened mysterious panels in the school-room pianoforte, and let us see the busy little hammers dancing about inside! Few children are privileged to experience the fearful delights of watching the threshing-machine at work, with its little wheels that buzzed so fast, and the fat, lazy wheels that did so little, while all the time the great machine chanted a harvest psalm of thanksgiving, to a strange melody which experience now tells me is the fourth Gregorian tone.

But this curiosity fortunately does not diminish with age. If anything, it increases. Any man who knows how things are done; who can graft trees; who can paint pictures; who can write good poetry; anyone who is, in the words of George Wyndham, a functional man, is a man whose friendship is to be desired. Any book which reveals to us the working of the spirit is a book to be read. What an insight we get into a poet's mind if we can see his original manuscript, and can discover why he scored out that weak word and substituted another; why Keats rewrote the sonnet 'Bright star, would I were steadfast as thou art,' and made so many and such significant alterations; why Beethoven added the two introductory notes to the great Adagio of the Sonata, Op. 106, after it had left his hands for the printer. But rarely, all too rarely, do poets and composers take us into their workshops, and even if they do, they never explain their method of work, but just let us pick up such information as we can. Thus Brahms recast his Trio in B major, and lets us compare the points of view of the matured composer and the less experienced youth. So also, we have many works in two forms by Beethoven, notably the Minuet in the Septet, which is the matured version of the little Sonatina in G major. These and other examples are common knowledge. Less known, but no less interesting, are Handel's two versions of various numbers of 'The Messiah.'

There has lately come into my possession a copy of 'The Messiah' as 'printed for I. Walsh.' The history of the book is obscure, but rumour tells me that it has been often held by royal hands. The leather binding is in a deplorable condition. The copy would also seem to be marked by royal criticism, for the word charming appears on two pages, but as this word also appears on the title-page it may be that this copy was used as an exercise-book by some royal and youthful student of orthography or spelling. At present, however, its interest is not through whose hands it has passed, but from whose hand it has come. I will briefly mention a few arias which differ from the version as used to-day. The whole aria 'But who may abide' was originally in one slow tempo —the words 'for He is like a refiner's fire' being set to vigorous, but not altogether satisfactory, semiquaver runs. The present recitative 'And lo! the angel of the Lord' was originally an aria which doubtless struck Handel as being too long. 'Rejoice greatly' was written throughout in twelve-eight time. The aria 'Thou art gone up on high' is very curious, as Handel originally wrote the melody to the words 'Thou hast led captivity captive' in double the time of the present melody. But the whole aria in this edition is merely a rough sketch for the accepted version as we know it now.

From these alterations made by Handel in his masterpiece we can learn a good deal, but oh, that he or some other great composer had left us a detailed account of how this or that work came into being! What a world of information we should have if Beethoven had written in his notebooks all his reasons for the alterations which he made in his melodies and designs! We should then know how far his master-strokes were luck and how far cunning—that is, the accumulated knowledge of a lifetime which enables a great master to make his most finished compositions sound like the spontaneous creations of a moment.

It is probably true that all inspired passages in music or poetry were born of Reason, though the various stages of their embryonic development (to us so slow and tedious) were, in the mind of the composer or the poet, concentrated into the space of a few seconds. Such concentration is possible only because men like Mozart or Shelley had so pondered on their art that consciously or unconsciously they could estimate the qualities necessary to the tune or the verse in the twinkling of an eye. That Keats did not write his euphonious and splendid lines by luck is proved, if proof were necessary, by his correspondence and his conversation, wherein he shows how critically and acutely he could appreciate the subtle technique of his predecessors. No doubt he was lucky, but his luck was the ability to think swiftly and deeply. In the same way we can call Norman Brookes a lucky tennis player if by lucky we mean the ability to think swiftly and to act instantaneously.

Let us now try to get behind the scenes, and discover, if possible, the reasons for some master-stroke of genius. Let us take the tune of the Finale of Beethoven's eighth Symphony ending with the great C sharp, which Sir George Grove erroneously, I believe, quotes as an instance of inspired hilarity. It may be inspired, but there is nevertheless a very good reason for its existence. I imagine that Beethoven's thoughts ran something like this: 'That Finale tune ends too tamely, too much C major; it fizzles out, and does not urge on the repetition of the tune. I must shake those last few bars out of their lethargy by a sudden shock. What more effective than a dominant-ninth? True, I did the same in the Funeral March of the A flat Sonata, but still, that was long ago.' Whereupon his next idea was to leap on to a loud D flat, running thence by a rapid downward scale into F major. But again Reason interfered. 'That's better,' she said, 'but is not that run down just a trifle obvious? Why not cut the intermediate link and jump right across from D flat into F major?' Which Beethoven did. This is mere conjecture and consequently valueless, but if we had Beethoven's personal testimony it would cast a flood of light upon the art of music, and our schools of composition would become almost useless.

Some people might deprecate the publication of such a book (should any composer ever contemplate writing it) on the ground that it would make musical composition appear to be the exploitation of tricks, or the exercising of mere ingenuity. Such a point of view could only be held by people who believe that Familiarity breeds Contempt. I do not know who is responsible for that cynical proverb, but I do know that it is a cruel libel upon all that is great and good in this world. Surely contempt can be bred from nothing except that which is contemptible. Let us rather say Familiarity breeds Respect, and in that spirit let us sojourn in the realms of noble Art, wandering hither and thither as directed by the elfish spirits of Strange Conjecture and of Wild Surmise.

LISZT'S 'CHRISTUS' AND 'ST. ELIZABETH'

By M.-D. Calvocoressi

In a country such as Britain, in which an enormous amount of choral music is performed, the neglect of Liszt's 'Christus' and 'St. Elizabeth of Hungary' is even more unjustifiable than that of the 'Faust' and 'Dante' Symphonies. Perhaps the fact of the matter is simply that many directors of choral societies are unacquainted with these two beautiful works, except by name—and practically every one of Liszt's works has been, or still is being, given a bad name. A little initiative in this direction would be speedily and richly rewarded. Both works are easily accessible, for the original publisher has issued, besides the vocal scores, full scores of convenient size and moderate price.

The vocal scores alone will not give an altogether accurate idea of the beauties of these works. Far more than is the case with the Symphonies, the pianoforte transcription is inadequate, and was bound to be so. In 'Christus,' especially, there are many long orchestral numbers whose interest is perfectly sustained as they stand, but whose texture is so simple, so subtly diversified by fine shades of scoring, that the pianoforte could not meet the requirements of the case.

There can, for instance, be no question that the exquisite simplicity and effectiveness of this passage (which I select not because it is particularly typical but because it is one of the easiest to quote here):

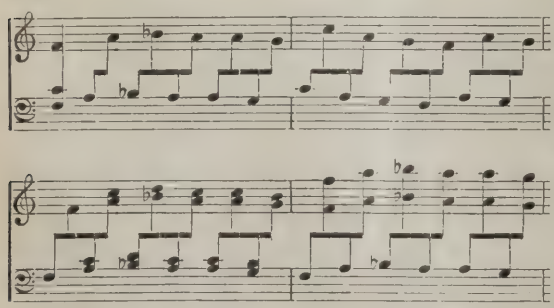
finds but a poor and cheap counterpart in the pianoforte version (I suspect that this version is the work of Liszt himself):

Ex. 2.



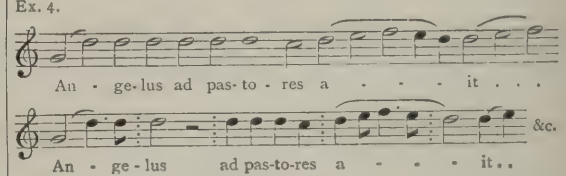
'Christus' consists of three parts: 'Christmas Oratorio,' 'After Epiphania,' and 'Passion and Resurrection.' Liszt made no attempt at narration, actual representation, nor (with one exception—'The Miracle' in the second part) at description. Biblical and liturgical texts supplied the materials for choral settings and a few intervening soli. Other texts inspired the preludes and interludes.

Most of the principal themes are liturgical phrases, used with a minimum of alterations. For instance, the Introduction is constructed upon the 'Rorate Coeli Desuper,' from the Graduale Romanum (Introitus, Advent IV. Liszt's version is given here after the original):

Ex. 3.

whose four phases are utilised in turn. Then comes an Allegretto pastorale whose theme begins with a motive derived from the opening notes of the 'Rorate,' and continues with another which heralds the Intonation of the 3rd Antiphon of Laudes, used in the following number, 'Angelus ad Pastores ait':

Ex. 4.



Another theme which plays an important part throughout the work is that of the 'Benedicamus Domino.' The 'Stabat Mater Dolorosa' in the third part originates in a 17th-century setting of the same hymn; the melody of the following Easter Hymn is borrowed from a 'Chant du Temps de Pâques,' which appears in the 'Heures de Notre Dame à l'Usage de Rome' of 1621.*

This choice of musical material is in itself characteristic of Liszt's design to maintain a tone of sober gravity—a design carried out unfalteringly, except in one number, 'The Foundation of the Church,' which stands out in sharp contrast with the remainder of the work. The graphically descriptive character of 'The Miracle' has already been alluded to—but there no fault can be found with the quality of the music.

To those who know Liszt chiefly by his inferior music, or by what is frequently written about him, 'Christus' will come as a great surprise precisely on account of its extraordinary simplicity and purity of style.

* This information is given in a most useful little pamphlet on 'Christus' by Th. Müller-Reuter, published by C. F. Kahnt, the original publishers of both 'Christus' and 'St. Elizabeth.'

The central point of the work is 'The Beatitudes,' set for baritone solo, chorus, and organ—a thing of inspired beauty, which Liszt had composed in 1856, and around which he gradually built up the entire oratorio. This and the following 'Pater Noster' for chorus and organ might easily be performed separately, pending the time when the whole work will come to its own.

Equally suitable for separate performance is the first part, which teems with beautiful music. It was given at the Paris Conservatoire in 1904, Georges Marty conducting. This was the only opportunity I ever had of hearing anything from 'Christus,' and I carry a lasting recollection of it.

The orchestral episodes—Introduction and Pastorale, Song of the Shepherds, and March and Adoration of the Magi—have a singularly artless and subtle charm. Liszt indulged in no deliberate research of archaism; yet the tone of the music is one of mediæval simplicity. As often as not, the impression produced is very similar to that which might be derived from a beautifully illustrated devotional manuscript. The Annunciation, and the 'Stabat Mater Speciosa' which follows upon it, are both impressively beautiful.

In the third part a sombre and poignant setting (orchestra and solo voice) of the words, 'Tristis est anima mea,' is followed by an equally impressive 'Stabat Mater Dolorosa' (four solo voices, chorus, and orchestra). Then, after the short, simple Easter hymn already mentioned, comes a powerful and spirited 'Resurrexit,' which brings the work to its close. In this last number, students will observe with interest the part played by the opening motive of the 'Rorate Cœli,' with its characteristic ascending fifth, and the majestic intonation of the 'Benedicamus.'

'St. Elizabeth of Hungary' actually comes very near being an 'opera sacra.' There is a plot to it, with plenty of incident and dialogue. It is, as a whole, not so fine a work as 'Christus.' It lacks the unity and sustained quality of style for which 'Christus' is so remarkable, but it contains a good deal of really fine music—among which that of the first two scenes, Elizabeth's arrival at the Wartburg and the 'Miracle of the Roses,' should be specially mentioned.

Again, the work in a way conveys an impression similar to that which might be derived from an old, naively, and richly illustrated devotional book—or, better still, from one of the beautiful, quaint, old polyptychs which represent episodes from the lives of some saints. The comparison need not be taken literally, of course: Liszt's music does not aim at being graphically descriptive or narrative. I am referring to its striking simplicity, its sweetness, and to the artless spirit in which it is carried out, as well as to the impression created by the plan of the work. Even the fact that here and there, in the melo-dramatic scenes in which the wicked Countess Sophia appears, design and execution are rather stiff, and the methods of characterisation somewhat conventional, lends additional colour to the comparison. But when all is said, were it only for the sake of the first two scenes and the big choral Finale, 'St. Elizabeth of Hungary' deserves the attention of all music-lovers.

I remember hearing the work at Paris in 1905. Its production was one of the memorable events that marked the course of Alfred Cortôt's all too brief span as a conductor. The impression created was great. As regards performance here, the chief trouble is that 'St. Elizabeth' will not meet the requirements of choral societies so well as does 'Christus,' for it contains only a small amount of choral music. Yet some one might and should be found to shoulder the responsibility of producing it after its all too long period of oblivion.

There are other great choral works of Liszt's which are neglected: the Thirteenth Psalm, the choruses for Herder's 'Prometheus,' the 'Graner Messe,' and the Hungarian Coronation Mass. I may attempt to deal with them in these columns at some later date—especially with the Masses, whose interest and beauty ought to be more easily recognised nowadays than they were when these works first came to light.

Ad Libitum

By 'Feste'

A reader sends me a newspaper report of a lecture delivered by Mr. A. Hirst, of Ashford, Kent, wherein are some startling statements:

> Handel, Bach, and Mozart never realised the expressive possibilities of music, and it was left to Beethoven to show us that music could be a language just as clear as our language of spoken words. In many ways the development of music of the heart was brought by Beethoven to a point that has never been surpassed, and that probably never will be, because Beethoven suffered so much, and had such a lofty conception of his art.

If this is a correct report of Mr. Hirst's views, one can only recommend him to make speedy acquaintance with the music of Handel, Bach, and Mozart. And if he really thinks that music, whether by Beethoven or anybody else, is 'a language as clear as our language of spoken words,' he ought to be able to explain why few people agree as to the meaning of any given piece of music unless it has a definite title attached; and also why, in the case of several pieces of music so labelled, the labels may in some cases be changed with little or no loss of effect. There is the further point that certain well-known and apparently convincing pieces of descriptive music have had their labels chosen and tied on by the composer after they were written.

Coming down to details, Mr. Hirst played the 'Moonlight' Sonata, > . . . explaining that it had now been discovered that the first movement was not a song without words, but a prayer without words—and that is what it sounds like.

What he did not explain, apparently, was that the title 'Moonlight' was not used by Beethoven, who, it is said, was amused at the popularity of the work. Moreover, if it has now been discovered that the first movement is a prayer, who made the discovery? And, if music is so clear a language, why had the meaning of the movement to wait a century before being 'discovered'? Mr. Hirst went on to say that,

> . . . he did not hesitate to agree with those people who thought that Beethoven was the greatest spirit who ever moved in any art.

'Those people' are few in number, I imagine. Be that as it may, what point or educational value is there in such sweeping statements? Can lecturers not get their audiences to appreciate the beauties of music without setting up a sort of competition between composers, and above all between composers and exponents of totally different arts? Apart from his music, Beethoven was a very ordinary and rather illiterate man. How can one compare him with (say) Shakespeare, who was certainly at least as great a poet in words as Beethoven was in sound, and who had the advantage of knowing more about music than Beethoven seems to have known about literature. Seeing that Mr. Hirst is such a Beethovenite, it is odd that his illustrative recital appears to have included no more of Beethoven than the so-called 'Moonlight' Sonata—generally admitted to be by no means among the best of the thirty-two. He played five pieces by Chopin, some Schumann, Grieg, Debussy, Rachmaninov, and Palmgren. A good programme; but if, before his next lecture on the 'Expressive in Music,' Mr. Hirst will pursue his investigations from Beethoven backwards he will compile an even better one.

Another reader in Kent sends me a cutting from a local paper giving a report of a concert at Chatham. I quote the purplest of many purple patches:

> Mr. —— mounted the rostrum, tapped the music stand with his white baton and waved his left hand languorously in the air as the first chords floated from the platform. The effect was joyous to behold, and in the warm silence stood this youthful interpreter on tip-toe, waiting to pounce upon the straying notes and flick a discordant flat with his wand. Poised like a sprite of Appollo's making, he sprang and crouched and swayed to the recalcitrant rhapsody, and all the while one was conscious of the sweet, sad air that somehow melted and whispered itself away in the gilded rafters.

The report goes on to describe the 'Egmont' Overture as 'haunting,' which is not the term that most of us would have chosen for this type of work. Later we are told that the 'Unfinished' Symphony is 'a difficult piece, and not always popular.' Clearly there is room for a lecture or two down Chatham way.

Dame Ethel Smyth is 'after' the critics again. Her latest outbreak is in a recent issue of the Publishing World, and she begins by once more telling us that she 'hardly ever reads newspapers,' she 'only skims them—often not even that.' (What a confession to come from one who took so prominent a part in the women's suffrage fight! How can she make intelligent use of the vote unless she keeps herself informed on national, international, political, and social questions? Whence can she get information if not from the newspapers? Any voter who boasts of doing no more than occasionally skimming the newspapers should be disfranchised.)

After adding that she 'hardly ever reads criticism, more especially musical criticism,' Dame Smyth proceeds to give us her views on the subject concerning which she confesses her ignorance. For she does not confine herself to a discussion of criticism in the abstract—a subject on which one may hold views without reading actual criticism—she goes further, and attacks the critics on mere hearsay:

> I am told [!] that musical criticism in this country is mainly destructive; no wonder, for to appreciate requires far greater knowledge than to pick holes.

Similarly, to appreciate the work of musical critics requires &c. There is much to be said in favour of getting first-hand knowledge of people's work before attacking it on the strength of what one has 'been told.'

> No doubt occasionally a critic may have a constructive suggestion to offer. As a German proverb says: 'Even a blind hen will sometimes pick up a grain.'

When the blind hen happens to be a composer . . .

However, let us sample the Dame's own critical writing:

> Music has been dead in this country for a hundred and thirty years. . . . Since Purcell, we have produced no composer who has created a new thing except Sir Arthur Sullivan.

What would the Dame have said had this sweeping bit of destructive criticism been written by a mere musical journalist?

Dame Smyth is emphatically of opinion that criticism can do nothing to elevate or guide public taste. 'No amount of talking or writing about music will ever do this,' and she adds that the same principle holds good with literature. Unfortunately for the Dame, her case is completely quashed by an editorial paragraph on another page of the very journal in which her article appears. I should like to have been by when she read the following:

> Dame Ethel Smyth told me that she makes only one exception from her general rule not to read newspapers, and that is the Sunday Times, which she takes for Edmund Gosse's literary articles. She holds Gosse's literary judgment in high esteem. . . She acknowledges Gosse's guidance. . . . His recommendations find a reflex in her library list.

So it appears that after all a critic may guide and elevate the taste of his readers! And if Gosse can do it, why not Newman? It is amusing to picture Dame Smyth taking up her Sunday Times, devoutly reading the literary article, and carefully avoiding the musical one. But does she? Isn't there sometimes a glance to 'see what "E. N." says about it'? Not just one little peep—especially when one of her own works has been performed during the week?

Musical criticism has had a good many futile attacks made on it, but, in its lack of knowledge, logic, and humour, this of Dame Smyth stands alone.

It is hard to see what grievance she has against the critics. They are invariably kindly in their references to her, and their obvious and unremitting efforts to find something favourable to say about her music surely deserve a better return than is made in such articles as the one quoted above. On second thoughts, however, it occurs to me that she is quite unaware of their kindness, for she 'hardly ever reads criticism, more especially musical criticism.' If there were a ghost of a chance of her seeing this column (for, of course, she wouldn't touch a mere musical journal), I should suggest that she turned over a new leaf and began by reading all the handsome things the blind, destructive critics have lately managed to write about her 'Mass.'

Some of our sensitive British composers and performers, before complaining of the rigours of criticism in this country, should go through a course of the American brand. Mr. Ernest Newman recently gave some specimens in the Daily Graphic, among them one concerning a tenor who sang Tristan recently at New York. Mr. Newman thought him the worst Tristan he had ever heard, but could not bring himself to hurt the poor man's feelings, so he 'merely said that the singer's voice was tight, and that he had no idea of acting.' (Merely!) 'But,' adds Mr. Newman, 'one of the most moderate of the New York critics wrote thus:

> Mr. Taucher made no attempt to sing this music as Wagner wrote it. For the most part he merely hollered —that is the accurate word for it, though 'shouted,' 'barked,' 'yelled,' would do almost as well.

Mr. Newman wonders what readers of an English newspaper would say if the critics talked about a tenor in that disrespectful way; and he doubts if any English editor would print so rough a verdict. Yet the term 'hollered' is really the only one for five out of six tenors—especially of the operatic breed. But though critics on this side may use the word in a general way, they must not apply it to any one of the five hollerers.

To the 'howlers' recently given in 'Occasional Notes' should be added some comments from essays written by children who attended Sir Dan Godfrey's lectures and concerts at Bournemouth. I like the frankness with which two youngsters dismiss what Sir Dan had described to them as 'head or mind music' (as distinct from dramatic, &c.):

> Head or mind music appeals to the intellect. I think that, unless one is in the mood for thinking things out, this is inclined to be dull.

> I understand that it gives something to think about, but I must say that it does not give me anything to think about.

Here are a couple of biographical brevities, the first containing a delicious non sequitur:

> Handel was a quiet, homely man, with twenty children. He was a German, but his father suppressed his feelings.

> Haydn was turned out of his home to earn his own living, so he wrote a 'Farewell' Symphony.

As a result of the 'parade' and description of the orchestral instruments the young idea shot thus:

> Sheepsgut (from which the strings are now made) is the backbone of the orchestra.

> The orchestra was first allowed to make a noise, and then to play music, and one could easily tell which was the latter.

But you won't always find it so easy, Enid!

And from a friend I hear of a school-girl who, when the class was invited to send up the titles of pieces to be played on the school gramophone, handed in a paper on which was written, 'Pig in sweet.' A good part of the available time was spent in discovering that she wanted the 'Peer Gynt' Suite.

As if there were not already more than enough confusing counsel given in books on singing, Miss Kate Cholditch Smith has been adding to the stock in a lecture recently given at Richmond. 'Deep breathing is a creation of the devil; you can't speak English if you open your mouth.' And she declared, 'I strongly believe in the closed mouth.' With difficulty I refrain from the obvious comment.

THE PIPES OF PAN

By Stanley H. Clarke

The fact that many musicians have had in their character a pronounced love of nature and outdoor life has been frequently remarked. Beethoven and Mendelssohn are two names which spring readily to the mind, of composers who expressed this feeling strongly both in their music and their writings, but indeed the love of country is reflected in many instrumental works, from the earlier and naive 'pastoral symphonies' to the tone-poems and topographical sketches of the moderns. The young composer of the present day often attains notice by virtue of a 'Kentish Rhapsody' or a 'Cumbrian Symphony,' or is inspired, maybe, by 'Hearing the first Corncrake in May.' It seems obvious that, although a professional musician's life may not encourage any great intimacy with nature, yet his appreciation of the outdoor life is intensified by the very force of contrast. This contrast between art and nature, between concert-room and some bird-haunted copse thrilling with spring music, is often in favour of the latter.

Writing as a musician who is passionately fond of all wild life, I would suggest that to such the subject of nature music is of particular interest, and worthy of more than superficial attention. Considering, therefore, Nature the Musician, we at once think of that family of hers which has brought her the greatest acclamation, and which it is superfluous to name. Yet the nightingale and the lark, which have inspired writers and singers from the very beginnings of poetry, have but comparatively recently received close attention and exact study from this standpoint. The subject of bird music and language has yet to be adequately treated, but we have had for some time an increasing number of naturalists who have followed what is a real labour of love. One of our greatest writers, whether considered as artist or naturalist, W. H. Hudson, has treated the theme with inimitable charm, and several have written of it from the more exclusively scientific point of view. But perhaps the most attractive introduction to this fascinating study is that charming little book by Prof. W. Garstang, 'Songs of the Birds,' as this also is the work of one who is both poet and scientist, student and lover. For myself, the appearance of this little work had a special interest, because it has long been one of my chief country pleasures to note carefully the various songs and call-notes of birds. My own opportunities have been limited, and I have not acquired a very large bird-vocabulary; but even if I had, this is not a treatise nor even an outline of the subject. Moreover, such attempts as have been made to translate bird-sounds by means of written descriptions, phonetic spelling, &c., are at best half-satisfactory. For this purpose we shall have to call the gramophone and wireless to our aid. It is sufficient, therefore, that I should emphasise what a fascinating study this is, for the nature-lover can know none which provides more constant delight and inexhaustible discovery. He becomes so intimately acquainted with the charming individualities of wild creatures, and soon finds that two birds of the same species may differ more in song than might be imagined. I could tell you, for example, of a cuckoo who augmented his minor third on each repetition, until I wondered how he would finish—it stretched to at least a perfect fourth, so sharp did his voice become with the effort of his song. I could tell you also of one talented blackbird who had a persistent predilection for a perky little phrase from the 'Fra Diavolo' Overture, which he rendered quite in tune. It is amusing to hear such fragments of familiar strains, and clear-cut diatonic phrases are common from the throats of thrushes, blackbirds, and starlings, although they are more the exception than the rule. Taking the avian répertoire as a whole, it consists mostly of subtle inflections and 'quarter-tones,' quite untranslatable by ordinary means. Several naturalists have, however, taken pains to reproduce in musical notation some of the more adaptable songs, and there has been compiled quite a collection of airs from the blackbird alone. This handsome artist has always been a favourite of mine, and I have been pleased to notice that several experienced naturalists have also favoured him by virtue of his pure musical and more human-like tone, whilst admitting the pre-eminence of the nightingale in its own style. Of the other most popular singers, the lark and the thrush, the former is pre-eminent as a brilliant virtuoso of a style which is most typically bird-like, and his dazzling cascades of silvery notes have an appeal quite different from the leisurely recitatives of the blackbird. The thrush, when at his best, is a supreme artist, and a great favourite by reason of his cheery optimism, but he usually shouts, and though this gives him an initial advantage over others, it is a rather vulgar attribute which becomes at times irritating. He is, however, one of the most accomplished in approaching our own idea of music. Besides being a skilful mimic he is a great formalist, who believes in the value of emphasis, and he repeats his fine phrases with the recklessness of a Schubert. He follows well the advice, 'When you have got hold of a good idea, stick to it!' His love of short, clear-cut phrases is in contrast to his sable cousin, for the blackbird, though he can invent scraps of defined melody, is a modernist at heart, and I always think of him as the Debussy of birdland.

I am here in danger of dwelling too long upon a favourite theme, so must leave these star singers to give a passing notice to some performers of more humble attainments.

Now, as a great pleasure of the traveller lies in exploring the lesser-known, neglected things, so the bird-lover finds a similar charm in the simpler strains of other than the recognised song-birds. There is the ceaseless musical chattering of the greenfinches, so dear to Richard Jeffries's heart, and the liquid piping of the plovers and sandpipers. Above all, there is that hauntingly-beautiful call of the curlew, so wild and far-reaching, and its other exquisitely-modulated rippling or bubbling strain, which seems so completely a part or expression of the bird's surroundings. This characteristic of expressing the spirit of place should possibly be ascribed to our habit of association, and yet one cannot resist imagining that in such a case as this there is an intrinsic quality of liquid beauty which does reflect the spirit or atmosphere of the bird's haunts on the desolate tidal flats or lonely moorlands.

However this may be, the curlew's cry is one of the most arresting of wild nature's voices, and I suppose that is why it has been appropriated by the starling, who is, it might be said, the 'grand robber' of bird-music. There are other species who run him fairly closely, for birds seem to have little conscience in the matter of plagiarism.

To pass directly from the consideration of the music of birds to that of insects may seem a very abrupt descent. The transition, however, is not so unnatural when we recollect the instrumental performances of the grasshoppers, crickets, and cicadas. Fabre tells us that the people of Southern Europe and Japan keep some of these little musicians in captivity, as others do canaries. They who are fortunate in knowing, and therefore loving, the writings of Fabre, will remember his descriptions of the wonderful 'musical box' of the crickets and grasshoppers, who are really fiddlers of sorts, or, more correctly, performers with bow and cymbals. The patient French naturalist played a very unfair trick upon one of these musicians: by interfering with his anatomy he tried to make him play with his left arm instead of with his right; but although Fabre persisted in his experiment, it was all in vain—the fiddler had learnt his technique in the legitimate manner, and refused to become a freak performer!

Notwithstanding the above, however, we cannot but consider these shrill monotonous scrapers as musically inferior to some of our larger animals, and, indeed, were we to review the whole population of the Zoo, we could probably find a fairly effective quadrupedal orchestra. Keeping, however, to every-day and native examples, where can be found a more remarkable performance than the familiar one of the domestic cat. Have we not here a supreme master of sostenuto, of subtle inflections, and prolonged diminuendos? I am inclined to think that the cat has a genuine innate musical sense not fully appreciated, though on this point a captious critic might contend, as with the nightingale, such music heard in the glamourous night-time, free from competition, is apt to be over-rated.

I fear it will be obvious to the reader by now that we are rapidly losing any clear distinction between music and noise we may have hitherto preserved. That distinction is indeed rather shady, and the fascination of nature is partly the fascination of the borderland. There should be some canon of taste in this subject, but who is to adjudicate upon the vibrant 'caw' of the rook, and are there not known individuals who have objected to the nightingale himself?

Moreover, in briefly considering nature's music, I do not think we should exclude her many performances upon instruments provided by man, for who has not been fascinated in childhood by the thrilling harmonies of the telegraph poles, or heard significant rhythms and elusive leit-motivs from some neglected water-tap?

Of nature's own and grandest achievements, of her symphonies of wood, wind, and water, it is difficult to say anything, when they have inspired legend and poetry from the earliest times: the pen of a Conrad is needed to treat worthily of them. A wonderful orchestra this, whose members are innumerable and unclassifiable, so subtly varied and delicate are their tones—the sighing of the pine trees, the rustling of the beechwoods, the whispering of grass and cornland, the dry crackling of whirling leaves, and the complaining of age-stiffened boughs straining before the gale.

I have always had a fancy that the four winds of heaven have themselves each a characteristic voice. This may be due to local geographical features, but whether so or not, to my ear the moan of a south-east wind freshening before rain seems in sharp contrast to the gusty passion and sullen booming of the nor'-wester.

Perhaps after all is said, Nature's greatest achievement is her water-music, ranging as it does from the thunderous percussion of Niagara, of sea or flood, through the menacing hiss of hail to the softest caress of spring rain. What is there of mystery and wonder we cannot hear in the humblest running stream, what elfin voices and strange, human-like communings, weird undertones, and sibilant whisperings?

Here, as always, nature is generous. She does not stint her gifts, but flings her delights freely and widely for all. Happy are they who have ears to hear!

STUDIES ON THE HORN

By W. F. H. Blandford

III.—The Fourth Horn in the 'Choral' Symphony

III.

(Concluded from February number, page 129.)

The difficulties of execution that this solo presents have been left to the last, as having no direct bearing on the problems attending its composition. They are considerable, but it would be an exaggeration to represent them as being of the highest order, even on the hand-horn. The solo is, for example, much easier than the passage (Ex. 6*) quoted from the Horn Sextet, though their technical demands cannot be closely compared.

We have no hesitation in saying that any cor-basse player of sufficient standing to justify his place in a symphony orchestra, should have been able, with a reasonable amount of practice, to master the solo, at least, as an isolated study.

Dealing primarily with the hand-horn player, there are a few special points to note. Weingartner mentions that the low G in bar 8 should be tied to the preceding one. This is clearly correct, although it is not so tied in the Philharmonic or, presumably, the other manuscripts. Not only is it impracticable to play the second G as a detached note (the artificial sounds were never employed as short notes), but breath must be taken immediately before the jump of two octaves, whereby little, if anything, of the note when tied will be heard. The jump itself is comparatively easy, because the player alights in the easiest part of his register, and can at once recover his balance and proceed. The next few bars are not harder than the solo (Ex. 2*) from the Wind Quintet, and the player is much helped by being able to correct his intonation by the other wind instruments. The long note in bar 13 renders it difficult to take breath before the scale-passage, and it is customary, at least in France, for another player to help out the soloist by holding this note to its full value. For the scale the performer must trust to his technical competence, to luck, and particularly to his ability to keep his head. The critical point of the solo is after the first high a♀, and here a slip is most likely to occur. Weingartner recommends if necessary taking a quick breath after the first a♀, an inartistic and probably needless precaution.

Both Berlioz and Gevaert quote this passage as an example of appropriate use of the stopped notes. There are no bad notes in section (b) except the low a♀, which can be made quite audible, but the section, being composed so largely of closed notes, must be kept very quiet, and the open notes suppressed, so as to avoid contrasting sonorities. Some of the old players were extraordinarily skilful at this, and it is said that their open and closed notes could hardly be distinguished from each other, a fact to be borne in mind by modern critics of the old method.

At no period could this solo have been played without adequate preliminary study except, possibly, by phenomenal artists. The hand-hornist did not possess the same power as does his successor of mastering difficulties at sight; and these sixteen bars call for command of an extreme compass, delicate hand-work, precise intonation and phrasing, and most careful study of respiration. If its exponents trusted to getting it right with only one or two orchestral rehearsals, it is no wonder if they made a mess of what they might have mastered with assiduous study and thereby conferred an evil reputation on the passage.

It has been suggested that the entire solo can be played on the E-crook, section (a) being taken half-stopped and section (b) falling then in the key of G, in which it is easier and of better effect. It is feasible, but in that case the fourth horn could not continue the rest of the movement, having no opportunity for again changing his unsuitable E-crook. It was always possible for another horn in E to play section (b), after which the fourth resumed his part. But it is doubtful if such expedients were ever resorted to by the hand-hornists.

* See January number, p. 32.

On the valve-horn the same difficulties recur except those arising from want of skill in the use of the hand. Section (b), at least the scale-passage, lies awkwardly for the F-horn, being then in the key of G flat. The entire solo can be most easily played on the E-crook, which brings section (b) into G. If the performer possesses a good and true E-crook, he gains nothing by adopting the F, for in both cases every single note must be taken from the same fundamental, i.e., it requires the same tube length. On the E-crook increased confidence in the most difficult part of the solo should result from the easier key.

In modern practice all sorts of variations have been adopted, here and abroad. Sometimes the first, the third, or the fourth horn has executed the entire solo; more commonly it has been divided between the fourth and one of the others, as Weingartner suggests. With the abolition of the old distinctions, our second or fourth horns of to-day cannot claim 'l'avantage reconnu de la qualité de son' of which Domnich speaks, and there is therefore no point in observing Beethoven's injunction 'Sempre Corno 2do.' Nor is there any reason why, in the present greatly changed circumstances, any concession should be made to the amour-propre of the fourth-hornist by allowing him to perform the entire solo, if any question arises about his competence. If the view here put forward is correct, Beethoven did not contemplate its being played by one who is 'the inferior of the other three.'

Should the precisian wish to reproduce on the valve-horn the tone-colour of the old stopped horn—and there is much to be said for its restoration in this solo—it can be done without mastering the old technique; but it would be inadvisable for a conductor to insist upon it without the cordial co-operation of a very skilful performer.

The two great obstacles to successful performance lie outside the limits of the solo itself. One is the extremely tiring nature of the horn parts in the first two movements of the Symphony. The second part is perhaps the worst of all, on account of its continual skips and general 'knock-about' character. Moreover it is longer than the fourth; in the first movement alone, excluding the repeat, it takes up some 413 bars as against some 330 of the fourth horn. On the other hand, the latter, if less jumpy, had, before transposition became possible, to play on the B flat bass crook, the most ungrateful of all on account of its great length. There was little to choose between them; but certainly no advantage in this respect would have been gained by making the second horn the soloist. That the part has been repeatedly played successfully by the fourth horn is a tribute to his stamina rather than the wisdom of the composer, here as elsewhere in the Symphony so inconsiderate to his executants, in imposing the critical work of this movement on a fatigued performer.

The other obstacle is—nervousness. The horn player is, of course, a by-word among musicians on account of his modest and retiring disposition. His aversion from anything savouring of publicity leads him to prefer the discreet anonymity of the opera or theatre orchestra to the limelight of the concert platform. Nowhere does that light beat more fiercely on him than in the performance of Beethoven's Symphonies. It is not that their horn passages are so astoundingly hard; much greater demands are made by Schumann, Wagner, or Richard Strauss—by Beethoven himself in the scena 'Komm Hoffnung' in 'Fidelio,' which touches the climax of orchestral difficulties for the hand-horn. The trouble lies partly in the clarity of the solo-passages—always in the foreground and hardly ever covered or doubled by other instruments—and partly in their extreme familiarity to the audience. The concert-goers sit there, as the executant knows, at least subconsciously, armed with, or with the recollection of, the score, or primed by analytical programmes containing such helpful remarks as that of Grove on the aforesaid scale-passage—'a feat of no ordinary difficulty for that much-tried instrument and, like other trials of life, not always successfully accomplished.' Their attitude is painfully like that of wolves waiting round the treed hunter. Unless his nerves are strong, the victim is obsessed with the fear of 'cracking'—the fear is translated into action, and crack he does! And so it happens that one man, who will deliver the 'Siegfried' horn-call without hesitation, blenches before this very solo, and another to whom the latter presents no special terrors passes a sleepless night before a performance of the 'Pastoral' Symphony.

Such idiosyncrasies have always to be taken into account; and it has been said by a player with years of honourable achievement behind him that they had taught him that 'nerve'—the antithesis of 'nervousness'—is the greatest asset a horn player can possess. Indeed, for lack of it, artists of great executive ability have been known to abandon a public career—Dauprat himself being a case in point.

The horn player has been aptly compared to the juggler or equilibrist who accomplishes most difficult feats with but a hairbreadth margin between failure and success, but the comparison breaks down at an important point. Every one knows what happens when a juggler attempts something exceptional which, no matter whether by design or accident, does not come off. Suppose now that, when the horn player cracked or wobbled in a trying passage, his failure were received with murmurs, not of disapproval, but of sympathy and encouragement; that the conductor immediately stopped the band; that in breathless silence the player repeated the passage two or three times until he got it right, whereupon amid thunders of applause the movement were resumed, while the gratified player bowed his thanks to a delighted audience. A pleasing and logical, but, we fear, Utopian parallel! There is no second try for the soloist; no amount of subsequent successes can retrieve his initial failure. If it were otherwise, the really great performer would not be the rare bird an eminent musician alleges him to be.

When complaint is made that horn players are not so good as they ought to be, the appropriate answer, in the words of a famous witticism, is, 'They never were.' Uncertainty is inherent in the instrument; like feminine capriciousness, it constitutes one of the charms that keep men slaving at the horn, often with no prospect of rising above mediocrity, when they might be earning better and easier money as municipal employees under a Labour corporation.

By way of epilogue, and on behalf of the many artists whose talent we have admired, may we, being in a position of greater freedom and less responsibility, respectfully ask the Musical Critic, sensu generico, why he is apt to be so sedulous in his concert-notices in reporting every lapse on the part of the horns? It is no sign of critical acumen to point out what was apparent to every listener—indeed, per contra, the horns have been known to be castigated for a wrong entry of the trombones; nor is it of interest to a reader who was not present to be told that the horn wobbled, was unsteady, or failed to reach its top note. Does the Critic realise that, disagreeable as a slip is (though little worse than the coughs or sneezes with which a winter concert abounds), it is far more distressing to the culprit than to anyone else; or that it may happen once in a while to the most highly-gifted player from any one of a multitude of causes of which the outsider takes no account?

Nervousness, over-confidence (a subtler form of the same complaint), fatigue caused by hours of hard work or rehearsals before the concert, a badly-arranged programme, a sore lip, a defective instrument (and few are perfect), a collection of moisture that could not be got rid of, even the untimely visit of the rate-collector, are among the multiplicity of causes, mental or physical, that may have inhibited the co-ordination between mind, nervous impulse, and muscular reaction on which success depends.

Let the Critic comment on defects of tone-quality, phrasing, or style, if they exist, and he may do good, as when he calls attention to defective voice-production or pronunciation, for these are remediable by study. But no horn player has ever yet been cured by a caustic remark in the newspapers of his tendency to an occasional mishap. On the contrary, he becomes more liable to lose his nerve, especially if the remark has called down a further censure from his conductor, and with it his engagement and his professional status. This is no fancy picture; chapter and verse can be given for actual incidents of the kind.

No one expects even the finest billiard-player or golfer never to break down at an easy hazard or a short putt. And, unless a horn-player habitually 'misses fire,' in which case the conductor can be trusted to attend to him, let the Critic pass over these misfortunes in kindly silence as 'rubs of the green,' continue to point out that a good horn-player is better worth £500 a night than many a prima donna (in which case he may perhaps some day get a fiftieth of the sum), and generally occupy himself with weightier matters of the Law.

A NOTE ON HARTY'S 'IRISH' SYMPHONY

By Frank Howes

During last summer Mr. Hamilton Harty wrote a Symphony which was first performed at a Hallé concert at Manchester in November last, and was introduced to the London public in January of this year. The composer describes it as an attempt to produce a Symphony in the Irish idiom, and he inserts a note in the programme giving the poetic basis of the work in his own early experiences.

What is the Irish idiom? Mr. Harty founds his themes on the native melodies of his country in order that they may have a 'characteristically Irish turn.' One result of this is that the Symphony is not a strongly personal work; it does, however, seem to reflect on the whole the Irish character.

The Irish character is not, of course, quite the same thing as the character of an Irishman, but the strange blend of dreaminess and poetic melancholy with energy and flashing wit is a recognisable characteristic common to most Irishmen, and the Symphony is full of it. The personal element which colours what, with its folk-song basis, might be a kind of generic image of the Irishman (like a composite photograph that produces a type from a dozen individual portraits super-imposed on one another), is the proportion of energy to the other elements.

The first movement is entitled 'On the Shores of Lough Neagh,' and Mr. Harty has written a note descriptive of the poetic basis of the movement. The Lough is a sheet of water, 'grey and sad, stretching for miles and miles to vague, misty shores.' To the children lying on its banks, old Patsy the Fiddler would come and play tunes and tell stories—stories of magic and romance. These stories, then, are the real subject of the first movement. But are they stories of battle and adventure? No; the favourite is that of the city buried 'for ever beneath the melancholy waters':

> Many a time we would stay quiet, thinking we could hear the faint sound of the silvery bells as they swung idly to and fro in the depths, while the mists gathered over the quiet Lough, and the curlews cried forlorn and sad, as if they were lamenting for the days that once had been.

It is almost startling, therefore, to find the Symphony opening with the subterranean urge of 'Avenging and bright,' which inevitably breaks through, and sweeps the whole orchestra along. The first episode, too, has little enough of the mood of dreamy melancholy in it, though in it we do feel a longing to regain something which has gone beyond recall:

Ex. 1. Con passione.

The dominating feature of this theme is the interval of a minor sixth between A and F, especially in its rising form of the last bar but two. The same feature has to be noted in both subjects of the slow movement:

Ex. 2 Lento.
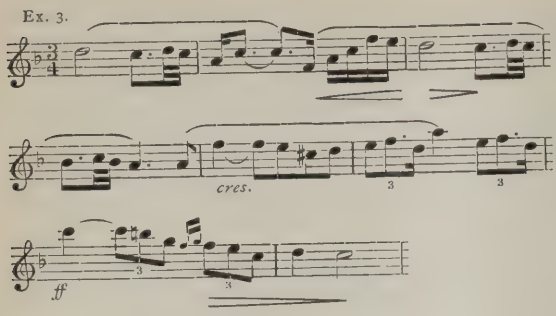
Molto espress.

Ex. 3.



This third movement is a lament, of which the programmatic basis is a wake for a young girl. Again Mr. Harty says, 'The general mood of the movement is not so much tragic as dreamy and wistful.' But this is hardly correct; energy is continually breaking through. The first movement, however, must not be left without admitting the existence of the dreamy elements in some wisps of violin solo and in the second subject:

Ex. 4. Lento.

(Note again how the whole theme is built on the interval of a sixth and its inversion.)

In the second and final movements energy predominates, in accordance with the composer's intentions. 'The Fair Day' is a Scherzo in the form of a reel, with a picturesque touch in the shape of a recruiting sergeant proceeding with a very scratch wind band through the bustle of the fair to the tune of 'The girl I left behind me.' The scoring of this for flutes and piccolo in consecutive chords of $\frac{5}{3}$ is a happy bit of realism. Have we not all of us in our time wrestled with the problem of making flageolets in D, flutes in C, cornets in B flat, and curious alto brass instruments of uncertain name in a key somewhere between E flat and F, fit together in a consort of music? The Irish sergeant cuts these Gordian knots by the simple command tutti, and Mr. Harty backs him up with a glissando on the xylophone, which puts every one in high good humour. The last movement is called 'The 12th of July,' and is full of vigour. Through the wild celebrations of the Orangemen, however, the sounds of the lament (the theme of the preceding movement) are heard, representing the approach of the funeral party. There is good precedent for the employment of this musical structure; Brahms sometimes reviews leading themes from previous movements in his Finales, but it is always a little doubtful whether they do not do more to destroy the unity of the single movement than they do to promote the unity of the whole.

The animation of this work makes it very pleasant to listen to, but the discrepancy between Mr. Harty's energy as musician and dreaminess as littérateur is curious. We know too little about the psychology of inspiration to account for it, but it certainly suggests that some aspects of a man's emotional nature find more ready expression in one medium, others in another. We know from experience that the artist shows one kind of qualities in his behaviour and another in his art. We now find that if he practises two arts he exhibits different qualities in each. Perhaps in the interpretation of other men's works Mr. Harty shows these qualities more evenly intermingled.

If this 'Irish' Symphony, with its orthodox form and folk-tune themes, has not a first-class symphonic interest, it has revealed an interesting bit of musical psychology much more clearly than many new works that are more original in purely musical respects.

Occasional Notes

Owing to the going-astray of a proof, several mishaps occurred to our Manchester correspondent's 'Occasional Note' last month on the Besses o' th' Barn Band. He spoke of the band as being 'under the guidance of Harry Barlow, one of the two great tuba players of the land'; the printer changed 'land' to 'band,' and so a high compliment was reduced to a pointless remark. The statement that Richter 'would have been as enthusiastic about Barlow as he was about' some other players was a further slip: Barlow had played under Richter, who was as enthusiastic, &c. The crowning misprint was in the remark that the 'pianist may scoff' (at some brass band arrangements). Pianists, of course, are the last people to scoff at such things, seeing how many arrangements they play themselves. What our correspondent wrote (none too clearly, be it said) was 'purists.' We hope we shall be forgiven by Mr. Barlow, the writer, and the purist.

The unabashed confessions of the Earl of Birkenhead at the dinner of the Federation of British Music Industries have been given liberal space in the daily press. How far the noble lord was in earnest, nobody seems to know. It must be assumed, however, that, as he is a politician, he meant what he said. This being so, we think the pick of his utterances should be recorded in a musical journal, in order that overhaulers of the volume in future years may see what an ex-Lord Chancellor said on January 28, 1925, before a London gathering which included a large proportion of the leading lights of the musical world:

> On many an occasion the hat has been struck from a moderately blameless head when the Royal Anthem was being sung because I was musically disqualified from identifying the tune. I never have in my life been able to tell one tune from another, and it has almost seemed to me a matter of singular unimportance which tune was being played at any moment . . . Although I am a poor man, I would rather pay £50 than sit through any classical concert which has ever been exhibited in this or any other country. It has always seemed to me that music could only be tolerated on the basis that it was not too loud . . . I recommend British music to you with enthusiasm. We cannot, unfortunately, end it, so let us at least devote all our efforts to evolve from it something which, however it may be tortured and tried, may avoid giving offence to non-musical persons.

The speech has already been so much discussed that we do not feel called on to say much about it. We merely point out that only in regard to music is such a confession ever made. An educated person who would rather pay £50 than visit a picture gallery or a theatre, or read a book, would decide that the matter was one for decent silence; nor would he announce to a gathering of literary lights his inability to distinguish a passage of Chaucer from one of Tennyson. In regard to the Earl's alleged failure to recognise the National Anthem, we hope he was as uncomfortable as was an unmusical friend of ours on an occasion when the 'Dead March' was played on the organ at the end of a village church service, in memory of a Royal princess who had died during the preceding week. He was a prominent local figure and an ex-army officer, holding a number of official posts, but when the entire congregation stood as the familiar opening chords sounded, he made his way out of the church, to the astonishment and scandal of the villagers. His subsequent chagrin may be imagined. His case reminds us of the lady in the limerick :

> There was a young lady of Sheen,
> Whose musical sense was not keen ;
> For she said, 'It is odd,
> I can never tell "God
> Save the Weasel" from "Pop goes > the Queen."'

It is customary to keep an eager public informed as to the details of dresses worn by prime donne, but hitherto musical journalists have been at least reticent concerning mere composers. An exception is being made by American writers where Stravinsky is concerned. As the press on this side has so far told the public nothing about this important aspect of Stravinsky's art, we make good the deficiency with the following from American musical journals :

> The second time I saw Stravinsky he had on a swallow-tail coat, and looked very much like other men in swallow-tail coats . . . But the first time was . . . in his apartment at the Hotel Langdon, and then he looked quite different, when he was attired in a light sweater jacket, decorated with alternate orange and grey stripes, vertical, which, after all, is quite different from what the average man wears, even at home. Besides, he wore a monocle on Monday. On Thursday he wore that same monocle round his neck, but when he came to conduct he took no chances of disturbing it, producing a pair of gold-mounted spectacles, and clamping them carefully over his ears.

And another :

> He was no longer the flamboyant figure in black and orange who walked down the gang plank the day before, but his costume was still individualistic. Gold chain bracelets flanked a wrist watch. Rings with vari-coloured stones covered his hands. With black patent-leather dancing pumps, he wore grey bags, a striped shirt, a black tie with a pearl scarfpin, and a rose and taupe sweater.

On the other hand, we hear comparatively little about Stravinsky's music. It is an ominous sign, this shifting of interest from a composer's output to his rings, monocle, patent-leather pumps, and grey bags.

What have we of the English press to set against this? Nothing but a tiny paragraph in the Lady's Companion which sets our mind at rest in regard to Dame Ethel Smyth's costume. After telling us that when the Dame is conducting, 'she is alert all the time,' the writer goes on :

> I saw her last conducting at a rehearsal of an amateur society who were to play 'The Wreckers.' She was wearing a tweed skirt and woollen golf coat and thick brogues, which is her favourite type of dress.

So there is light on yet one more of the things that matter.

Turning over the Musical Times for January, 1881, recently, we came across an 'Occasional Note' that is of interest in view of the development of wireless telegraphy. After quoting the St. James's Gazette opinion that > . . . the problem of utilising the telephone for the benefit of amateurs who wish to hear the music of public performances without leaving their own homes has been solved, the Musical Times writer said he was 'unable to take this sanguine view of the case,' and went on to speak of the dissatisfaction of folk who had heard a recent Leeds Festival performance by wire. He quotes a letter from a New York writer, describing the defects of the telephonic transmission of music :

> The chief drawback is a confused, jangling, blurred sound, like the rattling of a large sheet of brass, which accompanies and envelops the very loud and very high tones in the choruses and finales. The other defect is the non-conveyance of the full quantity and exact quality of certain instruments, notably the violoncellos, double-basess, trombones, tubas, and percussion.

On which the Musical Times writer comments :

> Our readers will have no difficulty in estimating the value of an instrument which refuses to convey, or misrepresents, the sounds of half the instruments in the orchestra, and accompanies the tones of the rest with a noise 'like the rattling of a large sheet of brass. On this testimony, backed by personal observation at Leeds, we are compelled to see in the telephone, as now used for musical purposes, a mere toy, interesting enough, but of slight practical value.

He ends, however, with a note of hope and prophecy that reads strikingly to-day, forty-four years after it was written :

> No one, however, should 'despise the day of small things.' The telephone is at present a baby instrument. When its majority is attained, subscribers to our musical societies may be renting wires and listening to symphonies and oratorios by their own firesides, in all the ease of dressing-gown and slippers.

A remarkably good long shot—except that we rent, not wires, but wireless! And, in case a reader objects that the prophet indicated the reaching of the telephone's majority as the date of successful transmission, we point out that the Electrophone Company has had its licensed domestic listeners for no less than thirty-two years. They were probably a small and select body, seeing that as recently as 1913 there were only two thousand of them. (In that year, by the by, performances from the Paris Opéra were 'on tap.') Visitors to Earl's Court Exhibition, over twenty years ago, may remember that electrophones gave visitors music on payment of sixpence, per slot.

In his 'Gramophone Notes' recently our contributor 'Discus,' commenting on the plentiful supply of records of symphonies, chamber music, &c., said : 'It would be interesting to hear how other countries compare with England in regard to the output of such records.' So far as America is concerned, the answer appears in the following paragraph from the New York Musical Courier of February 5 :

> For the first time complete talking machine records are available in this country of some of the most famous symphonies and chamber music works. They should, it seems, be of particular value to students of orchestration, especially those who have the patience to do the necessary shifts and windings to play, for instance, the Dvorák 'New World' Symphony, which is recorded in ten parts on five double-sided records.

'For the first time . . . !' How many moons is it since we on this side first shifted and wound for the 'New World'? Benighted England may be short of millionaires to subsidise her orchestras, but she has for years past had something even better—a musical public sufficiently large to make the issue of records of classical works a business proposition well worth the attention of practically all the British recording companies. The complete catalogue of H.M.V., for example, would make our New York confrère rub his eyes.

News from over the water: we take the following from the New York Morning Telegraph:

> A Britisher has invented a contrivance that can be fitted on safe doors and locks and which will open only in response to a musical note. If the instrument is tuned to A flat and a burglar basso sings A sharp at it nothing will happen. The cracksman will have to be equipped with a tuning-fork and strike the precise note before the lock will react to his tones. So that, when a man goes in for music over there, his friends don't know whether he's studying to become an opera singer or a yegg. One thing about life in dear old Lunnon—it may be grey, but it's never dull.

But those of us who are yeggs on the quiet easily get over the difficulty by putting into our jemmy-case a set of tuning-forks covering the whole gamut.

In our last month's 'Occasional Notes' we gave a remarkable example of journalistic coincidence—two articles, word for word the same, signed by different authors, appearing in two journals at the same time. (See an explanatory letter, on page 248.) Here is another, on a much smaller scale, but worth noting. In the Musical Mirror for February, under the heading 'The Organist and Choralist,' appears a passage remarkably like one in a book published a few years ago, entitled 'The Complete Organist' (chapter on Recitals). They are given below:

Musical Mirror

> A recital programme sent to me from M—— very fussily insists upon the importance of silence on the part of the audience. It thus concludes:
> 'IMPROVISATION: A STORM AT SEA'
> SILENCE PLEASE!
> I am no great lover of these meteorological fantasias, as my readers know. It may have been realistic enough, but if it were no better than some I have sat through, then the instruction was unquestionably issued to the wrong party.

The Complete Organist

> Directions to the audience as to the importance of silence . . . are increasingly made. Most emphatic is the admonition, in large capitals, on the programmes of some lunch-hour recitals in a colonial city. It comes with special force on one programme in particular:
> 'IMPROVISATION: REPRESENTING A STORM'
> SILENCE PLEASE!
> If this particular storm was no better than some we have sat through, the command was issued to the wrong party.

The Musical Mirror article (which is signed 'Yor-keba') contains one or two other passages that have a familiar ring, though we cannot yet trace their parallels; and we have on several previous occasions noticed this characteristic on 'Yor-keba's' part. He must often feel annoyed to find that so much of his work has been anticipated by other writers.

We add that the question is raised here not on personal grounds, but as a matter of general and journalistic interest. Neither Mr. Bannard nor 'Yor-keba' is personally known to us.

Mr. Kaikhosru Sorabji writes pointing out that in alluding to the 'musical something-or-other,' he had not in view the Musical Times, but another journal. As we were under the impression that the Galli-Curci comment which roused his fury had appeared only in the Musical Times, we naturally fitted the cap on. This correction does not of course affect the real point at issue; it merely shows the desirability of being specific.

New Music

CHURCH MUSIC

A number of new settings of the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis should appeal to a variety of tastes. Those who can appreciate music with a decided modal flavour will be attracted by that of Ernest Bullock in the key of C with the minor seventh (Novello). This key is, of course, the same thing as the Mixolydian mode (G to G with no F sharp). Dr. Bullock has written broad, dignified phrases for the voices, sometimes in unison, frequently in two-part harmony, with two pairs of voices doubling each other in the octave, and occasionally for four-part unaccompanied singing. This simple, but highly effective vocal writing, in conjunction with the admirable free organ part, should produce an impressive result.

Quite different in style, though also off the beaten track, is the setting in E by E. L. M. Pritchard (S.P.C.K. Church Music, No. 32). It is quite easy to sing, and is mainly set for alternate men and boys in unison, with optional verses for singing in four-part harmony. The vocal writing is interesting, and the organ part, though very simple, is well devised.

Two settings from Banks & Son, York, provide a strong contrast with the above. That by Henry Gibson is skilfully written, with a fair amount of elaboration in the vocal parts. It has a decidedly modern flavour, and its rather ornate style will probably appeal to many. It needs a good choir. In J. T. Horne's setting in D minor, the vocal writing is bold and straightforward in style, with a fair amount of unison work. It is quite easy to sing. A florid organ part rather overworks a somewhat hackneyed formula.

Also from Banks & Son come two anthems. W. E. Rowbottom's 'I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills' is a well-written work for four voices, expressively treated, and containing parts for soprano solo and semi-chorus. It is of only moderate difficulty. Equally suited for an average choir is E. Douglas Tayler's festive setting of 'Sing we merrily unto God our Strength.' A quiet middle section gives opportunities for soprano and bass solos and quartet.

A simple Benedicite by Geoffrey Shaw (S.P.C.K. Church Music, No. 31) may be recommended. It is well planned, and successfully avoids monotony. It may be sung in unison throughout, or in harmony, unaccompanied.

Two new settings of the Communion Service come from the Faith Press. 'Missa Sancti Petri,' by T. Guy Lucas, is for four voices, unaccompanied, or the organ may duplicate the voice parts. A nine-fold Kyrie is included. The music is simple and straightforward, and is intended to be sung in free rhythm. In some of the brisker sections this object would be more easily attained were the chord changes less frequent. For example, with the crotchet as unit, each word of the phrase, 'We give thanks to Thee for Thy great glory' is harmonized with a different crotchet chord, of which all except one are in root position. There is a bad misprint in the first bar of the second line of the Creed, where the treble note for 'things' should be F instead of A.

The other setting is an adaptation for the English Church of John Taverner's 'Western Wynde' Mass, by Dom Anselm Hughes, O.S.B. The Latin setting of this Mass, adapted for modern use by H. B. Collins, was reviewed last month. It was shown that the editor had found it necessary freely to cut certain movements in order to render them suitable for present-day use. The same thing has been done to a still greater extent in this English edition. The editor points out that 'following the practice of the composer, who adapted at least two of his own Masses to English words, shorter music has been fitted to English than is originally set to Latin texts.' The work of adaptation appears to have been well carried out, and the result is a setting of quite reasonable length, which should be welcomed by many. A good choir is, of course, needed. It should be noted that no setting for the Creed appears in this edition. Also, a serious printer's error occurs on page 7, second bar. Over the word 'Lamb,' the treble E requires a dot, and should be followed by a crotchet D.

A glance through the Sixth Set of Novello's Hymns and Tunes for Sunday School Anniversary Services makes abundantly clear the gratifying fact that within recent years there has been a marked improvement in the standard of music used at these services. This latest set includes tunes by, amongst others, H. A. Chambers, Ethel Boyce (words also), Alec Rowley, and C. H. Lloyd. All the tunes appear in both notations, and the words are also issued separately.

Specially written for these same services is a Hymn-Anthem, 'Happy Day! Festal Day!' by H. A. Chambers, with words by Mary Bradford Whiting (Novello). It is brightly-written, tuneful music, containing parts for children and for a four-part choir, which are manipulated in a very pleasing manner. G. G.

A NEW WORK ON THE PASSION

Those who are looking for new music for use during the Lenten season might with advantage turn their attention to Sydney H. Nicholson's recently-produced work, 'The Saviour of the World'—a Devotion on the Passion (Faith Press, 2*s.* 6*d.*). The music is for treble, tenor, and baritone solos, choir, and organ. There is also a part for a Reader, which maybe taken either by a priest or a layman. The arrangement of the words is by the Rev. C. G. Douglas. The proses are mainly from Holy Scripture or the Book of Common Prayer.

The argument of this Devotion is as follows: Part 1, Creation's Worship; Part 2, Creation's Weariness; Part 3, Creation's Pain and the Prophetic Answer; Part 4, The Message of Salvation; Part 5, The Passion (according to St. Luke); Part 6, The Continual Remembrance. As a preparation for Section 5, it is suggested that a Procession be held where possible. During the Procession two stations are made—one at the font and a second at the chancel. Organ interludes are provided, so arranged that they may be shortened or lengthened to meet varying needs. All the music at this stage should be sung unaccompanied. Should the Procession not be desired, a dozen or so pages are omitted, thus providing an opportunity for a convenient 'cut' in a somewhat lengthy work.

As regards the music, we think it will be generally conceded that Mr. Nicholson has produced a work which should have no small share in influencing for good the standard of present-day church music—particularly music dealing with the subject of the Passion. Not the least successful features are the numerous hymns which occur at intervals, and in the singing of which the congregation takes a share. For these some admirable tunes have been written, the treatment of which has been effectively varied by the use of descant and faux-bourdon. Although the music is nowhere really difficult, to ensure its full effect the choir should be capable of good unaccompanied singing. Good soloists are also needed, the baritone in particular having a great deal of work to do. On p. 38 there is a misplaced treble clef. G. G.

CHAMBER MUSIC

New compositions for chamber music are few at all times, and perhaps the added expense of publication since the war has made both publishers and composers more cautious than they were wont to be. This month the new works of this class amount to four—all published by Messrs. Augener. The first is a new edition of Schumann's Quartet in A minor, hitherto obtainable only in a German edition. It will be welcomed, I imagine, for the cult of Schumann has not yet passed its zenith. We have come to regard him more critically than his admirers of the last generation used to do. At the same time, it must be said that he appeals now to a wider circle than ever. If he is inclined to be a little too 'fair and square' at times, if he has an unconquerable passion for repetition, if he firmly believes that four parts are better than three (hence the monotony of his orchestration), he has nevertheless expressed certain moods of intimate charm and refinement in a way which ensures for him the lasting gratitude of musicians. His Quartets have never lost their attraction for both performers and listeners. The present edition is as clear and neat as anyone could wish.

The other novelties are Three Dances for string quartet or string orchestra with double-bass (ad libitum) and pianoforte, the composer being Adam Carse. By the alternative of a string orchestra, with or without double-bass and with or without pianoforte, Mr. Carse has spread his net wide. He has also taken other precautions. His melody has a pleasant lilt, and his harmonies are deft, yet he avoids the commonplace as successfully as over-elaboration.

His music is not great music. But it is engaging, useful, and the very thing for students anxious to pass a pleasant half-hour in practising ensemble. The three dances—Dainty Dance, Languid Dance, and Waltz—are of much the same moderate difficulty, the first violin part being quite possible to a violinist who knows his fifth position. B. V.

SONGS

Among the many songs awaiting review an unusually large number are of high quality. Peter Warlock's 'Late Summer' and 'The Singer' are short essays well up to his best standard, with real tunes for the voice, and beautifully written pianoforte parts (Augener).

Alec Rowley has provided delicate and expressive settings of a couple of poems from madrigal sources —'My lovely wanton jewel' and 'O softly singing lute.' Gerrard Williams's 'The Windmill' is in refreshing contrast to most songs dealing with this subject. The impression of size and strength is given without recourse to the usual blustrous and vulgar methods. The use of the little twirling triplet figure is very happy (Winthrop Rogers).

The same composer has set a couple of old poems—'Now wolde I faine some merthes make,' and 'My Sweet Sweeting'—to music that is perhaps too self-consciously mediæval. The alternative version with string quartet accompaniment would be more effective than the pianoforte form. The keyboard instrument is rarely happy with an austere mode and texture of this kind. Hubert Foss has provided an effective (though too sophisticated) accompaniment to the folk-song, 'The trees they do grow high' (a Hertfordshire version). E. J. Moeran has done the same (with a more practised hand) for a Norfolk folk-song, 'The Sailor and Young Nancy.' The use of a chorus, unison, as suggested, would make this song very effective. Very bold and full of character is W. G. Whittaker's 'The Chief Centurions,' a setting of some lines by John Masefield. The form is largely that of a free ground bass, and some of the dissonances have to be lived with awhile before one gets on terms with the song. Four of Schubert's best songs appear with English translations by A. H. Fox-Strangways, E. J. Potts, and Steuart Wilson—'The Inner Light' ('Du bist die Ruh'), 'The Novice' ('Die junge Nonne'), 'The Quiet Night' ('Nacht und Träume'), and 'The Setting Sun' ('Freiwilliges Versinken'). Such fine editions need no more than bare mention (Oxford Press).

First-rate in every way are four songs by Arthur Benjamin. 'Man and Woman' is a vigorous setting, in old style, yet original, of Motteux's 'Man is for woman made'; 'To Phillis, milking her flock' has a delightful pianoforte part, with a leaping figure which gives us the picture very neatly. In 'The Piper' the instrument is used again with graphic effect; and no less happy is the atmospheric suggestion in 'The Moon.' Singers and players with imagination and skill will revel in these songs. Eric Fogg has written yet one more setting of Keats's 'The Devon Maid'—tuneful, and good despite a few touches of the obvious (Elkin). Percy Turnbull has gone to Herrick—drawing, not on the overworked amorous and blossomy side of that queer poet-parson, but on his religious numbers. The text of 'To God' and 'Ejaculation to God' is not for every singer or audience. Mr. Turnbull has a strong Whittaker-like style. There is conviction in these songs, with their bold transitions and enterprising rhythms. (In the last bar of page 1 of 'To God' there is a trap for the sight-reading pianist—the sharp belongs to the E, not the G.) Graham Peel's 'In City Streets' is a tuneful and effective setting of verses by Ada Smith, wherein the lure of London is contrasted unfavourably with the countryside (Forsyth).

From Enoch's comes vol. 3 of 'English Ayres,' edited by Peter Warlock and Philip Wilson. This set contains twenty-one numbers by various composers, with copious biographical and other notes. There is no need to discuss these delightful songs. The same publishers send also a song of Peter Warlock's, 'Milkmaids.' The words are from an old source, and the tune is a capital ditty with a smack of folk-song.

Purcell's beautiful 'When I am laid in earth' has just been issued in separate song form by Novello. Here, again, mere mention is sufficient.

CHORAL MUSIC: UNISON SONGS

Here, as usual, there is so much new material that only a part of it can be reviewed, and that but briefly.

In the School Music Review series are some tuneful examples by Alec Rowley ('The Merry Fisherman,' 'Whither away?' and 'Thorn-Apple Tree') and Arthur Richards ('Snowdrops'). These have the merit of being singable (and playable)—a virtue less common with children's songs than it ought to be (Novello).

Among the new examples from the Oxford Press may be mentioned favourably Hubert J. Foss's arrangement of a French traditional song, 'Auprès du ma Blonde'; the same composer's version of an army marching song—evidently not for schools—'The Last Long Mile,' in which the pianoforte part shows some signs of effort on Mr. Foss's part; W. G. Whittaker's broad setting of Kipling's 'The Children's Song' ('Land of our birth'); and E. J. Moeran's arrangement of the folk-song, 'Under the broom' (wherein are some rhythmical difficulties that call for skill).

Stainer & Bell have issued a Manx folk-song, 'The sheep under the snow,' arranged by Henry G. Ley, whose effective version of the song for S.A.T.B. is well-known.

FEMALE-VOICE CHOIR

For two-part singing (S S.) there is an attractive arrangement of Mendelssohn's 'You spotted snakes,' a capital piece for light staccato work and bright voices with good high notes. The parts are not difficult. Much the same description applies to Percy Fletcher's 'The Fairy Queen' ('Come, follow, follow me, You fairy elves that be'), for S.S.; the song ends with an ad lib. dance. Mr. Fletcher has written also a tuneful song for S.A., 'The New Year Comes,' with which is issued an arrangement, with descant, of 'All through the night.' For S.S.A. there is an arrangement of Adam Carse's 'Nursery Rhymes'; of Bantock's 'O can ye sew cushions'; and an excellent setting of 'Now is the month of maying,' by Amherst Webber, for soprano solo and S.S.A. chorus. (By the way, what is the authority for the foot-note telling us that in 'Say, dainty nymphs and speak, Shall we play barley break,' 'speak' is pronounced 'spake'?) All the songs mentioned in this paragraph are published by Novello.

From the Oxford Press come three carols (settings of old words), by Jane M. Joseph, for S.S.A., unaccompanied, well written and attractive; and 'May Day Carol,' by Gerrard Williams, a traditional song arranged for four equal voices unaccompanied (better suited to women's than to men's voices, and so included here).

Rather difficult, but well worth the pains, is Eleanor C. Rudall's 'The Robin,' for S.S.A. and pianoforte (Joseph Williams).

A choir able to manage rapid free S.S.S.A. writing (unaccompanied) would find good work in Kenneth Finlay's arrangement of the Scots song, 'The Gallant Weaver' (Boosey).

MALE-VOICE CHOIR

Good fun and excellent practice are in Adam Carse's 'Nursery Rhymes' (T.T.B.B.). They call for alert singing and the free style which so many choirs of this kind lack. By way of contrast, here is an arrangement for T. (or A.) T.B.B. of Sullivan's 'Hymn of the Homeland.' Both these are issued by Novello.

A good knowledge of choral effect is shown by Kenneth Finlay in his arrangement for T.T. (or baritone), baritone, and B., of a Highland melody to Blackie's words, 'My faithful fond one' (Joseph Williams), and, for the same combination, of 'The Lass of Gowrie' (Boosey).

MIXED-VOICE CHOIRS

There can be little doubt that too many choral conductors, in their enthusiasm for Bach, make the mistake of attacking such immense works as the Mass and Passions when their forces would be far better employed in dealing with the Cantatas. (It is not so much a matter of technical difficulty as of physical endurance.) It is good to see the stock of Cantatas in English versions steadily growing. Paterson's have done specially good service in issuing Bach's two light examples—'The Peasant Cantata' and 'The Coffee Cantata.' The editors, J. Michael Diack and Harry Edgar Baker, have skilfully adapted both works for stage presentation, as well as for choral use. This tuneful music should enlist a host of friends among folk who might shy at Bach's other Cantatas. The same publishers have also brought out a compilation of Bach choral movements, under the title of the 'Hundredth Psalm.' This is announced as the first of a series of works in which certain choral movements of Bach's which are set to texts unsuitable for English use, will be adapted to scriptural or other fitting words, due care being taken to preserve the mood of the original. The number under notice consists of a fine lengthy chorus (partly for double-choir), a chorale (a German version of the 'Old 100th'), a shortish four-part chorus, and a concluding choral (the doxology set to the 'Old 100th'). The editors are Sir Ivor Atkins and J. Michael Diack. A word of praise is due to the bold, clear print and excellent binding of these Cantatas.

An issue of Bach's Church Cantatas has been started by the Oxford Press, the first number being 'Sing we the Birth' ('Das neugebor'ne Kindelein'). Dr. W. G. Whittaker is the editor, and Prof. Sanford Terry is responsible for the Englishing of the text. Both notations are used in the chorus, with somewhat crowded result at times. As everybody knows, a great deal of the accompaniment of these works was left by Bach as a figured bass. It is now generally understood (at all events by musicians likely to perform the Cantatas) that the necessary filling-in is the work of the editor; this being so, it is customary to set the music out with no indications as to where Bach ends and the editor begins. One may agree with Dr. Whittaker that such indications are desirable, without approving of his method of printing his contribution to the score in small type. It is modest and honest, but bothering to the eyesight of the player. Excellent features in this edition are the page of analysis and the attractive cover. The choruses are published in a separate form—a move that will be appreciated by choral society treasurers.

A curious piece of adaptation is 'A Song of Devotion.' It consists of Mendelssohn's first Organ Sonata, arranged for solo quartet, chorus, and organ by Melchiorre Mauro-Cottone (H. W. Gray; Novello). The choral in the first movement obviously suggests something of the kind, and the voices enter at this point, singing the choral unaccompanied. The text of this portion of the work is an English hymn, the arranger providing the subsequent words. The work as a whole appears to be very effective. Thus, in the recitative which precedes the Finale, the quiet, canonic parts are given to a solo quartet, sometimes unaccompanied, the organ entering with the big chords between the phrases. The Finale is so skilfully treated that it might well pass for an original choral work with a particularly well written organ part. Opinions will differ as to the justification of this adaptation, but there can be no doubt about the excellence of its carrying-out, and, so far as can be judged by the eye, the result should be effective.

It is not clear from the title whether Roger-Ducasse's 'Madrigal' for four voices and orchestra is for vocal quartet or chorus. It is published in an edition with pianoforte accompaniment, and the voice parts may be had separately. The text is in French—a poem of Molière. The music is difficult, and not to be appraised without a hearing (Durand).

Maurice Jacobson's Choral Fantasia on airs from 'The Beggar's Opera,' for tenor solo (ad lib.), mixed-voice chorus, and orchestra, ought to be a popular success. The tunes need no bush, and the arranging and linking up could hardly be better. An ingenious touch is on page 15 of the vocal score, where 'The first time at the looking-glass' and 'Over the hills and far away' are combined happily. The Fantasia would give choirs a jolly time as relief from the usual over-serious work of such singers (Curwen).

A few effective small works remain for mention—Kenneth Finlay's 'Through the Wood' (S.A.T.B.), a modal song in folk-song style to Scottish words (Boosey); Michael Cavendish's 'To former joy' (S.S.A.T.B.) and 'Every bush now springing' (S.S.A.T.B.), two additions to the series of English madrigals transcribed by Peter Warlock and Philip Wilson (Enoch); and Alfred H. Allen's 'Wolfram's Dirge' (S.S.A.A.T.B.), a well-written and expressive setting of a poem by Beddoes (Stainer & Bell).

PIANOFORTE MUSIC

Holst's 'Toccata' is said to be his first work for pianoforte, and it therefore has special interest. Clearly the composer is under no delusions as to the potentialities of the instrument. He doesn't give it long sustained melodies to sing, or expect it to sustain clearly three or four clumps of notes of differing tonality. For him the pianoforte means percussion, and accordingly he takes an old Northumbrian pipe tune, and spins from it eight pages of moto perpetuo, making the most of the brittle, xylophone-like effects of the top notes. Harmonic variety is got by plunges into unexpected keys rather than by modulation. A bracing, brilliant bit of work, and a good study in getting about the keyboard with neatness and despatch (Curwen).

Eugène Goossens's 'Ships' is a set of Three Preludes, descriptive of a tug, a tramp, and a liner. As usual in such cases, a good deal depends on the label, but there is no denying the mastery shown in the writing. Mr. Goossens credits the pianoforte with all sorts of faculties, and really manages to make out an astonishingly good case for it. It need hardly be said that these pieces are very difficult. They are strong meat in every way, but a good deal of the music appeals at once—e.g., the opening of 'The Tug,' and the expansive feeling of 'The Liner' (Curwen).

Felix White's 'On Fancy's Wing' is overloaded, surely; the wing is clogged. Here is a case of too many notes and too much dissonance (Curwen).

It is a relief to turn to a set of pieces by Purcell, Byrd, Arne, &c., edited by Thomas F. Dunhill under the title of 'Old English Masters'—a delightful set of pieces of moderate difficulty (Joseph Williams).

Two albums of similar style are Ernest Austin's 'Borrowed Melodies' (Larway) and Thomas F. Dunhill's 'English Folk-Song Pieces' (Joseph Williams). Mr. Austin has gone to Wales for this set. Both these collections are admirable examples of simple, yet musicianly, treatment of folk-melodies. Tuneful, and of moderate difficulty, are Ethel Boyce's Suite, 'The Garland' (Augener); Charles H. Lloyd's 'Catch me if you can,' 'In the gloaming,' and 'Scouts' March' (Augener); and Sinding's 'Dance Steps,' 'Legend,' and 'Joy' (Augener). The last-named requires a good deal of skill in arpeggio playing by both hands.

John Ireland's Prelude in E flat is a grimly serious bit of work, with some characteristic clashings. It is not extremely difficult in regard to technique, but it calls for a good deal on the mental side (Augener).

Quite unnecessary, surely, is Pouishnov's transcription of the ballet music from 'Rosamund.' A straightforward arrangement might be welcome, but there should be no use for the transcriber's anachronistic harmonies (Enoch). Nor is it easy to understand anybody wanting a pianoforte version of the ballet music from 'William Tell.' Still, here it is (Augener). Yet more Rossini—this time the Suite from 'La Boutique Fantasque' (Chester).

Of Eugène Goossens's 'Two Studies,' the second a Scherzo, seems to be best. It is ingenious rhythmically, and contains some gorgeous harmony. No. 1, 'Folk-tune,' takes a simple air, and gradually smothers it with luscious chords. These two effective pieces are rather less difficult than most of his pianoforte music (Chester).

Alec Rowley's 'Homage Suite' consists of a Prelude, Saraband, and Rigadoon—tributes to the memory of Gibbons, Purcell, and Blow. They are well written, but a trifle fussy, perhaps, in their insistence on accented auxiliary notes. They are fairly difficult (Winthrop Rogers). The influence of Chopin is plainly seen at times in Reginald King's 'Five Preludes,' which show a good management of pianistic effect of a somewhat old-fashioned type. and would make capital studies (Joseph Williams), There is abundant character in Alexandre Tcherepnin's 'Feuilles Libres,' a set of four pieces, three on the gloomy side, the other marked Excité, and containing some wild work in the glissando line. All four call for good players (Durand).

ORGAN MUSIC

The production of large-scale works for organ seems at the present time to be left to France. Here is Louis Vierne's fifth Symphony (Durand), an affair of seventy pages. A composition of such magnitude would stand a poor chance of publication in England, yet there are more organs and organists, more recitals, and a far bigger public for organ music in England than in France. An anomalous state of things, surely.

This Symphony of Vierne's is unequal. So far as sustained excellence goes, the composer seems to have reached his best in the third Symphony, with the second running it close. No. 5 consists of five movements—Grave (in the gloomy, enigmatic style of the Prelude in No. 4), Allegro Molto Marcato, Tempo di Scherzo, Larghetto, and Final. The opening and closing movements have a connecting link, the theme of the Grave (A minor) being changed from a vague halting series of notes into a bright, swinging tune. But the connection between the two is practically only on paper; very few hearers would detect it. The Allegro Marcato is a splendid movement save for some over-chromatic moments. The Scherzo recalls that of No. 3 in its use of pungent harmonies—most people will find the continued pungency monotonous. The Larghetto contains some exquisite music, especially in its opening section, and at the end, where the theme is given to an 8-ft. pedal, with undulating harmonies. The Final is a typical French Alla Toccata movement, a simple theme brilliantly accompanied. Contrast is provided by some involved chromatic material—rather too much of it, perhaps. On the whole, one feels that Vierne is repeating himself a good deal in all the passages where the interest is mainly harmonic. He is far too fond of dissonances based on the tonal scale. Nothing more quickly clogs than such progressions; the diminished seventh is robust by the side of them. Apart from this (which will not strike everybody as a defect) the Symphony is a fine work. It is perhaps over long; some of the repetition and development might have been spared. One need scarcely add that it is very difficult.

Who would have expected an organ piece by Mendelssohn at this time of day? Yet a Prelude in C minor, edited by Sir Ivor Atkins, has just been published by Paterson. The title tells us it was 'composed for Henry E. Dibdin, Esquire.' It is a three-page essay, quiet and thoughtful, and would make a capital voluntary, study, or even a recital item, when something simple and subdued is wanted. The piece was a sequel to Mendelssohn's visit to Edinburgh. Dibdin took him to Trinity Church to try the organ, and on his return to Germany the composer wrote the Prelude and sent it to Dibdin, who had a few copies lithographed. The piece, slight as it is, is worthy of its place beside the rest of Mendelssohn's organ music.

Among American writers for the organ a prominent place seems likely to be taken by Leo Sowerby. His 'Prelude on the Benediction' (Boston Music Co.)

shows skill and high aim. It is practically a Prelude and Fugue, the subject being the Plainsong for 'Ite missa est.' The music is an effective blend of the free and austere. It is moderately difficult.

J. Stuart Archer has made an easy and effective arrangement of the 'Hindoo Song' from 'Sadko' (Paxton).

Good Wedding Marches are so rare that there should be a welcome for that by Basil Harwood just published (Novello). It has breadth and dignity, and is well suited to any festive occasion, or recital. It is of moderate difficulty. Alfred Hollins's 'Barcarolle' is typical of the composer, flowing and tuneful, and pleasant to player and hearer (Novello).

STRING MUSIC

Messrs. Joseph Williams are the only firm of publishers to contribute violin music this month. Of their novelties we feel inclined to give first place to Arthur Somervell's 'Old Tunes for Young Fiddlers,' which fully carries out the promise of its title. The tunes are excellent; they are well presented, and are harmonized simply and effectively. Their technical range is very moderate, and does not extend beyond the third position. Mr. Spencer Dyke, who has bowed and fingered the violin part, has also turned 'Annie Laurie' into a second position exercise—well, there are worse introductions to the 'even' and more difficult positions than 'Annie Laurie.'

Stewart Macpherson's 'A Lament' is more ambitious in scope and technique, but equally adapted to teaching purposes. Melody of this kind is an excellent preparation for the bowing of adagios of a certain type and for the study of tone-production.

Richard H. Walthew's Serenade-Sonata in F minor belongs to a different order of things. There is no thought of bringing up the young idea the way it should go when you write a sonata. The only consideration is the expression of original ideas, and very often the performer must shift for himself as best he can. Walthew it quite considerate for a modern. Neither the pianoforte nor the violin has anything to do which could be at all described as 'un'-pianistic or 'un'-violinistic. His ideas are attractive if not particularly distinguished, and if the use of certain figures appears at a reading a trifle monotonous it is quite possible that a performance supervised by the composer may convey a different impression.

Schumann's 'Abendlied' has been arranged by many people and for many instruments. W. H. Squire's arrangement for violoncello and pianoforte accompaniment (Joseph Williams) is not only careful but meticulous. Almost every note in the 'cello part bears directions for fingering, and expression marks abound.

Dr. Eaglefield-Hull lectured to a large audience at the Polytechnic, Regent Street, on January 16, on 'Four Contemporary Composers'—Bax, Bartók, Scriabin, and Ravel. The illustrations were played by Miss Margaret Barlow, Miss Thelma Bryon, Mrs. Clifford Austin, and Miss Labalestrière, and included Bax's 'Lullaby' and 'A Hill Tune,' Bartók's 'Sonatina' and 'Bear Dance,' Scriabin's 'Study for the Left Hand,' No. 2, and Sonata No. 10, and Ravel's Sonatina and 'L'Oiseau Triste.'

ÆOLIAN-VOCALION

Many people think that Dvorák wrote only one Humoresque. To such may be recommended a 10-in. d.-s. giving three others from the set that made up Op. 101. They are played by the Life Guards Band, in an arrangement made by Retford. The loud passages strike me as coarse; otherwise the record is good.

Jelly d'Aranyi is heard in an Allegro from a Martini Sonata and a Scherzando of Marsich—neither piece being of great moment. The performance is rougher than we expect from this fine player; the fault may be in the recording (10-in. d.-s.).

York Bowen gives us an exceptionally good pianoforte record, playing his own Arabesque and Debussy's 'Jardins sous la Pluie.' Not only is the playing brilliant—the tone-quality is well above the average (12-in. d.-s.)

Ireland's 'The Holy Boy' and Fauré's 'Elégie,' arranged for viola, beautifully played by Lionel Tertis, are on a 12-in. d.-s. The Ireland piece is played minus pianoforte. I put it that way instead of following the label and describing the performance as 'unaccompanied,' because it is accompanied—by the vilest scratch a record can produce. Until extraneous noises are things of the past, the recording companies must think twice before issuing records of one-dimensional music. A bare, melodic line simply makes the record shout, 'Hark at my scratch!' (Here I may add that all these Æ.-Voc. records are scratchier than they should be. But thanks are due to the Company for abolishing the hideous and obscure black and green label in favour of a cheerful red and black that may easily be read.)

The vocal records include one of Constance Willis singing Chaminade's 'Ritornelle' and Brahms's 'The Sandman' (10-in. The singer is described as a contralto, but sounds like a mezzo-soprano; a pleasant voice. She badly overdoes the rall. in the Brahms song); Roy Henderson—Cowen's 'Onaway awake, beloved' and Tchaikovsky's 'To the Forest' (10-in.; he is better in the Cowen song, though the quick passages come out too much like a patter-song; in 'To the Forest' he relies too much on vibrato for expression, and is given to pressing the tone on the longer notes); Malcolm McEachern in Fisher's 'Spanish Gold' and Breville-Smith's 'Witch of Bowden' (10-in., diction unusually good); Giulio Crimi in excerpts from 'Zaza' and 'La Favorita' (12-in., ear-splitting with an ordinary needle); and Eric Marshall in arias from 'Dinorah' and 'Don Sebastiano' (12-in., a fine ringing voice, with far more variety and appeal than most of the much-boomed Italian operatic men singers. But can it be that many people prefer to hear Mr. Henderson in extracts from defunct operas rather than in a couple of fine songs?).

COLUMBIA

By an oversight last month I omitted to give the title of the Brahms work I was reviewing. As most readers probably guessed, it was the first Symphony.

The only orchestral work in this month's Columbia batch is Ravel's 'Pavane pour une Infante défunte,' played by the Queen's Hall Light Orchestra, conducted by Frank Bridge (12-in. d.-s.). One would expect this piece to record particularly well, but the result is disappointing, being colourless and not very clear—a great pity in the case of a beautiful and popular work which, apparently, has not been recorded hitherto. We have had too much duplicating of successful records: here is a legitimate opening for another shot.

On the other hand, a work that has now been recorded so brilliantly that the result can hardly be excelled is Mozart's B flat Quartet, played by the Léner party (three 12-in. d.-s.). Here is Mozart at his best, played and reproduced as near to perfection as any reasonable being can desire.

Wood-wind instruments are very successful viâ the gramophone; and Brahms's Trio for clarinet, pianoforte, and violoncello is not often heard. This two-fold reason made one turn on a record of the work with more than usual interest. The players are Messrs. Draper, Hamilton Harty, and Squire. The balance leaves at times a good deal to be desired. We get delightful bits of the clarinet, but on the whole the 'cello bosses the show. The pianoforte tone is excellent, and one wishes there were more of it. Evidently this combination of instruments sets up a problem in balance that has not been solved. But the records are very welcome additions to the gramophone repertory, if only for the fact of their giving us a chance of getting on terms with a type of chamber music that is too rarely heard (three 12-in. d.-s.).

Delius's Sonata No. 2, for violin and pianoforte, is recorded on two 10-in. d.-s., played by Albert Sammons and Howard-Jones. That the playing is first-rate goes without saying, and the interest lies there rather than in the work itself. Delius is not often happy in any medium other than the orchestra.

Lionel Tertis gives us a capital record of a Bach air (an arrangement of one of the Schemelli Song Book numbers) and an Aria by Porpora (10-in. d.-s.).

Casals gives us some fascinating playing in an arrangement of a Mendelssohn 'Song without Words' (that in E, sometimes called 'Serenade'), and Tchaikovsky's Melody in E flat (10-in. d.-s.). The last word in grace and finish, surely!

One of the finest of Handel's songs is 'Hark, the tempest wildly raging,' from 'Partenope.' It is here recorded, splendidly sung by Norman Allin, the florid passages being clear, and the long phrasing masterly. The orchestral accompaniment is rather indefinite. On the other side is Charles Wood's 'Ethiopia saluting the Colours.' Here the words are not clear—a more than usually serious defect, as the text is so much out of the ordinary run that the hearer can hardly grasp the import of the song even by hearing. (Plunket Greene said recently, in a letter to the Observer, that the words of this song must be familiar to the audience before a note is sung.) Mr. Allin manages the old slave-woman's broken utterances very effectively. A more telling accompaniment would have been an improvement. We don't get enough of the suggestion of the army on the march. What a fine imaginative bit of work this song is, both in words and music!

Rex Palmer makes what I imagine to be his gramophone débût in a couple of 'Elijah' extracts—'Is not His word like a fire?' and 'It is enough.' A good, telling voice, not quite big enough for the first of these pieces, perhaps. Words clear, as we might expect from a B.B.C. announcer; but the clearness seems to be achieved at the cost of flow. It sounds a bit square and stilted. A strong point is the capital pace and energy (12-in. d.-s.). I like Mr. Palmer less in his other records—Aiken's 'Maire, my girl' and 'The Ballad-Monger,' from Easthope Martin's 'Songs of the Fair.' The words are less clear, and the songs are but so-so. (10-in. d.-s.).

Surely Purcell's 'I attempt from love's sickness' is a man's song? It never sounds convincing from a woman. Dora Labbette's singing of it suffers, too, from overmuch pulling-about of the time. (And, by the way, she uses an arrangement that introduces a dreadful bit of harmonization.) On the other side she is heard to far greater advantage in Lehmann's 'O tell me, nightingale' (10-in. d.-s.).

H.M.V.

Only one orchestral record is in this month's batch, but that one is a top-notcher. It fills four sides, and gives us Tchaikovsky's 'Francesca da Rimini,' played by the Symphony Orchestra under Albert Coates. As usual, Tchaikovsky's scoring comes through the ordeal with flying colours—the figure is specially appropriate to this wildly-whirling and vividly-hued music. I have heard nothing better on the gramophone than the best bits of this, especially the little fluttering scale-passages for the flute. They are of fascinating delicacy and clearness. Hearing this record, one sees Mr. Coates 'all out,' and not in vain.

No less successful in its very different way is the record of the Virtuoso String Quartet's performance of Beethoven's E minor Quartet (four 12-in.). This, one of the composer's very finest works, is recorded complete, and the level of performance and reproduction is, if anything, above the average. The sonority is an excellent feature—there is little of the apologetic boxed-up effect that takes the gilt off so many chamber music records.

Another popular work that appears uncut this month is Franck's Violin and Pianoforte Sonata (four 12-in.). The players are Thibaud and Cortôt. The recording shows a great advance on a previous one of this work. The pianoforte tone is good, save in the opening Allegretto, where the chords come out (on my machine, at all events) rather lumpily. Of the playing there is no need to speak. Balance is unusually good. Popular success, we know, came to Franck so late in life that he had no more than the merest taste of it. 'You see, they begin to understand me at last,' he said, after the first performance of his Quartet. (He was then sixty-nine years old; think of it, young composers in a hurry!) And here he is, on the gramophone. Of the little group of mature works on which his fame rests, the Symphony, 'Le Chasseur Maudit,' the Symphonic Variations, and the Sonata have now been recorded, and I understand the Quartet is on the way. (A problem for the recorders, this last, for it is about the longest of quartets, and leaves very little change out of an hour. But we shall be grateful if we get only the lovely first movement.)

Among vocal records a very high place must be given to that of Fernand Ansseau and Helen Sadoven, in the Finale of 'Carmen.' This is a really fine bit of work all round—not forgetting the vividly reproduced orchestral part of the score. This performance is in two parts, on a 12-in.

Battistini is recorded singing 'A tanto amor!' from 'La Favorita,' and 'Non più andrai' (12-in.). The veteran is a marvel, of course, but I feel that the Mozart aria needs something that only a far younger singer can put into it.

Beniamino Gigli lets himself go in 'Cieola e mar!' from 'La Gioconda,' and 'Vesta la giubba.' The power is tremendous, and when the inevitable sob comes along in the 'Pagliacci' piece it turns out to be about the largest and most succulent ever recorded. If you like this sort of thing. . . . (If not, you will laugh, as I did.)

In a record described as 'A Fragment—Dvorák's "From the New World,"' the Savoy Orpheans merely succeed in showing the limitations of the modern dance band. It does nothing that is not done infinitely better by Dvorák's orchestra. If these players leave the dance field, it must be for some original work suited to their powers of expression. How very limited these powers are musicians have long seen. Sooner or later even dancers will be aware of the monotony. Then the jazz-band bubble will be pricked.

In reply to inquiries, we have to express regret at the unavoidable omission of 'Wireless Notes' from the past few issues. We hope they will recommence in the April number.

'Good Singing.' By James Edmondson. [The Author, Barrow Point Avenue, Pinner, 3*s*. 6*d*.]

One of the chief troubles about singing is that there are far too many words written about it, and too few of those words are plain. Mr. Shakespeare's book lives up to the promise of his title: he is above all plain and practical. He is all for thoroughness, too, which is just the quality lacking in the singing world to-day. Teachers and pupils in a hurry should read this book, and learn from it (if they are not too far gone in their maze of short cuts and royal roads) how to make haste slowly. On almost every page one finds something to serve as a reminder of the poor state of the vocal art at the present time. Breathing, for example: Mr. Shakespeare says that 'whenever sufficient breath is taken silently, it has been drawn in correctly,' and he italicises the sentence. The word 'silently' might well have been printed in large capitals. How many well-known singers of to-day would pass this test? The gramophone records give the answer with deadly frankness. You can hear many a 'star' taking in supplies with an effect suggestive of soup rather than air. Again, Mr. Shakespeare quotes the familiar saying of Pacchiarotti: 'He who knows how to breathe and how to pronounce knows well how to sing.' As we hear so many of our singers taking breath, and do not hear them pronounce . . . Yet another saying, this time of Crescentini: 'Singing consists of freedom about the neck, and the voice on the breath.' Let half-strangled tenors (not all obscure) think of that, and ask themselves if they will be singing like Ben Davies at sixty odd. And if not, why not? After the constricted throat, the tight jaw:

> Many a professor has been asked, 'How can I loosen my jaw?' Quite an absurd question, for the jaw is one of the most long-suffering parts of our anatomy. We can talk all day, and eat for hours, without its feeling tired. Whoever heard the boy complain: 'I am not ready for breakfast; I have not loosened my jaw'? Has anyone ever lost a tooth through not opening the mouth sufficiently at meal times?

Hardly: but if eaters worried about their jaws as much as singers, there might be another tale to tell. As Mr. Shakespeare says:

> We need therefore not think of the jaw, for with the throat open, it cannot be fixed, but seems to float, as just before yawning.

In the matter of power and quality, Mr. Shakespeare's motto is, 'never louder than lovely'—a principle that was surely never properly driven home during the training of some of the more devastating of the Mediterranean tenors and basses who afflict us per gramophone.

A valuable part of Mr. Shakespeare's book consists of extracts from treatises by early teachers, chiefly Italian, with comments from the author. He winds up this section pertinently, thus:

> May not what is written here lead to such inquiries as: (1.) What are the singing schools of the present day doing? (2.) Do they still maintain the same high principles? (3.) In our concerts and theatres, do we enjoy sounds of beauty which touch the soul; or are we not, at times, astounded and pained by notes unnaturally forced, frequently harsh, and even tremulous?

There can be little doubt that the answer is an indictment of most of the present-day teaching of singing. The reason is to be found in the pages on 'How to Study,' wherein the value of technique is insisted on. Until singers cheerfully do a good deal more of the sheer technical grind that every instrumentalist worth his salt has to undergo, there will be no improvement. In part the remedy is in the hands of composers. Much of the vocal writing of to-day shows a lamentable ignorance of the possibilities (and even more of the limitations) of the voice. Even such an elementary point as compass is often overlooked. Mr. Shakespeare says:

> Some two years before his death, I begged the great Brahms to write some songs specially for the tenor voice. I told him I found his lovely songs too low. He said, 'Transpose them higher, for I like them transposed according to the voice.' 'But,' I said, 'if I put them up, then there are notes which will be too high, for the tenor voice is only good between the two A flats. Your songs are too extensive in compass.' 'Ja, ja,' he said, 'that is what my friend Walther, the tenor, tells me.' What a loss it is then, that the beautiful songs of some great composers are not more often written for one particular kind of voice, like the music of any Italian composers.

Yet neither Brahms nor the many smaller men who err in this way would ever dream of writing impossible passages for any ordinary member of the orchestral family. Song composers as well as singers should read this wise and friendly book.

After Mr. Shakespeare's 'plain words' the title of Mr. Breare's book gives one pause—'Vocal Analyses: Sensitising Breath—Emotional Evolution.' Happily the style of this somewhat alarming label is not maintained throughout. Mr. Breare is colloquial most of the time; unfortunately he is inclined to be incoherent as well. Much of what he says would be admirable if delivered orally at a lesson and backed up by illustrations, but on paper some of his expressions are dangerous—for example, when he says that the low notes of basses must 'in attack be coughed in a round, loose ball.' The expression 'a ball of tone' seems to be a favourite. Thus:

> The low note [in a male voice] is a much larger ball of tone, therefore requires more breath. The male should hold his breath and explode it lightly on the vocal cords so that they vibrate from top to bottom. Before coughing this ball of loose breath, it must be held and coughed—a hollow cough. He may gradually apply compression on that ball of air (at the bottom of the fully open throat) which is pressing on the vocal cords, and then resort to a little compression there and in the nasal cavity. The cough I mean I can only liken to a staccato 'belch' of wind from the stomach.

Plain words, with a vengeance! One wouldn't mind if they were likely to be helpful; but do our male singers need injunctions to cough hollowly and to hike up 'balls of tone'? Again, on 'Emotional Contrasts':

> THE SOB.—The sob is a breath stoppage, or cough, in the throat, occurring during the passage of a legato humming breath.
> THE HYSTERICAL SCREAM.—This is a head tone, and the breath is a very rapid, irresponsible gush of loose breath, &c.
> THE CHOKING VOICE IN TEARS.—Whilst the tone is crying in the nose, the choking sensation is done by a staccato cough or brief stoppage of breath at the bottom of the open throat. Choke in the throat!

There are chokes, coughs, and screams enough and to spare already, without instruction books on their production. They have their place in operatic crises, but the ordinary singer in the stage of study presupposed by this book needs rather to be told how to avoid such phenomena. There is much good sense in Mr. Breare's pages, marred by an exaggerated method of expression, and some unhappy similes. Hence the need for caution on the part of the reader.

Mr. Freer talks cool, practical, good sense on interpretation. Like Mr. Shakespeare, he falls foul of modern composers' treatment of the voice. As he says, many songs, excellent and full of interest from a purely musical point of view, fail largely through the ineffectiveness of the voice part. And he adds a truth that is often overlooked by those who wonder at the success achieved by the third-rate ballad:

> That is why the bad song so often scores. Its poorness is hidden beneath the shallow effectiveness which is very largely due to the physical ease with which it can be sung.

I am glad to see Mr. Freer protesting against > . . . the utterly stupid idea held by some women that it is permissible to sing songs the words of which could only be uttered, with any sincerity, by men. For example, nothing could be more idiotic than to hear a woman sing:

> 'Go not, happy day, from the shining fields,
> Go not, happy day, till the maiden yields.'
> And yet women often sing Frank Bridge's charming setting of these words. . . . If the words cannot be uttered with absolute sincerity the interpretation cannot possibly be convincing.

Only a few days ago we had a contralto in a London concert-hall singing Handel's 'Hear me, ye winds and waves'—a lament by Cæsar in a moment of eclipse. And women are given to singing 'Annie Laurie,' Gounod's 'Serenade,' and many other songs that are ridiculous coming from their lips. But nobody laughs. Men, having a sense of humour and fitness (which is pretty much the same thing), leave women's songs alone. Mr. Freer's book is full of excellent counsel for teachers and pupils alike. (Note that on p. 29 there is a bad misprint in the music example.)

Garcia's Treatise has stood the test of time so well that a new edition needs little more than mention. The revision has been done by the author's grandson, who has 'replaced a few of the exercises by some taken from the original edition'; corrected a few slips that have crept in during the many reprintings; and slightly abridged and simplified the letterpress. Looking at these large pages of exercises corresponding to the purely technical studies of the pianist, one sees the secret of the permanent results of the old thoroughgoing methods of training. The numerous examples from some faded operas give several pages of the treatise an old-fashioned look; perhaps the reviser should have gone a bit farther, and removed these in favour of excerpts from modern works which students with the stage in view are bound to study.

Singing, when all is said, is largely a matter of the commonsense application of a few principles, plus methodical work. Mr. Edmondson's 'Good Singing' is a mere pamphlet of nineteen pages, yet it has the root of the whole matter, and some of the branches and flowers as well. He makes it clear at the start that no written instruction can take the place of personal tuition under a good teacher. But there are those who for various reasons cannot go to a teacher. For such this admirable boiling down of essentials will prove more useful (and safer) than many a far bigger book. Owing to its size, the latter will often be read carelessly, and we know but too well the tendency of such books to become cloudy in expression and sometimes dangerous through attempting to treat in detail and on paper what cannot be taught properly save through vocal demonstration. Mr. Edmondson includes a few exercises of the simplest type, and is to be congratulated on an unusually skilful bit of bovrilising.

'The Elements of Staff Notation.' By Paul Edmonds.
[Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons, 5*s*.]

'Examination Aural Tests.' By Frederick G. Shinn.
[Augener, 6*s*.]

'Studies in Sight-Singing.' By Ernest Read.
[Joseph Williams, 2*s*.]

Here are three books that should prove useful both to students and teachers of music. The first, by Paul Edmonds, is an admirably direct and simple course in reading from the staff. The author holds the opinion that some simplification of the methods of teaching Staff Notation is desirable, and this Primer is an attempt to provide such a simplification. As far as possible, simple and non-technical language is employed, and non-essentials are omitted. Mr. Edmonds considers that one of the chief hindrances to progress has been the premature use of exercises in keys containing sharps and flats. Many exercises are therefore given in the keys of C and A minor, and the student is recommended not to pass on to the remaining keys till he is reasonably proficient in these two. A feature of the book is the large number of exercises it contains, including many in time and varied rhythms. For this reason alone it should prove of particular value to teachers of class-singing.

Dr. Shinn's concise little work is intended for those preparing for the tests given in the examinations of the Associated Board and in the diploma examinations of the R.A.M. and the R.C.M. Teachers, and also candidates who have to prepare largely by themselves, will find many valuable hints on methods of study and plenty of material to work upon. The author claims that in both these directions ground has been broken which has hitherto been left untouched by any previous writer upon this subject. Particularly helpful are the sections on Rhythm and Melody. The chapter on Cadences runs into more than twenty pages, and is admirably treated. Both this chapter and that on Rhythm are supplemented by a specially copious supply of exercises for practice.

Mr. Read's book is based upon the principles laid down in 'Aural Culture' (Stewart Macpherson and Ernest Read). It can, however, be used with any other book or method of sight-singing. It is a well-chosen collection of graded exercises, rhythms, melodies, and rounds, intended for elementary pupils. The exercises are grouped under seven headings: The Scale, Melody Memorization, the Scale and Chord Chart, Semibreve Tests, Rhythm Tests, Time and Tune Tests, and Melodies. A brief 'Foreword' gives suggestions on the method of using the exercises. Rather more than half the book deals with major keys (up to three sharps and flats). The next section, on the minor key, confines itself to A minor in its three forms—Harmonic, Melodic, and Æolian. Exercises introducing simple chromatic notes—the sharpened 4th, the flattened 7th, and the sharpened 5th—follow, the work concluding with a brief section on Modulation. G. G.

'The Accompaniment of Plainchant.' By George Oldroyd and Charles W. Pearce.
[Curwen, 7*s.* 6*d.*]

Although there have long been bulky treatises on this subject in French and German, this appears to be the first English work of its kind. Its claim to be 'a practical guide to students' is well-founded, the letterpress being easily understandable and the examples copious and well-written. Had it appeared a few years earlier we might have been spared the stiff harmonizations of plainsong that disfigure some otherwise excellent hymnals, the common fault being the loading of almost every note with a separate chord instead of treating a good proportion of the melody as passing-notes. The book opens with a section on the notation of plainsong, the method of reading, &c. For the subsequent illustrations the modern quaver notation is used—wisely, for there is no doubt that the bulk of future plainsong publications intended for practical use in churches will be so noted. The varying character of the modes is well shown: the reader of this book will have no excuse for making the still frequent mistake of regarding modal and diatonic as synonymous terms. The authors are on the severe side in the matter of discords and passing-notes, but that is a virtue rather than a fault in a work of the kind. When the student can think in the modes as easily as in the modern scales, he will see many delightful possibilities in the way of dissonances, and he need not hesitate to use them. The examples of plainsong harmonization by Sullivan, Wesley, &c., given by the authors show how far we have progressed in the knowledge of this important subject. To-day no musician of importance would write such accompaniments; if he did, he would hardly find a publisher. (Yet we must not adopt a superior air towards the earlier Victorians in this matter. At that time as little was known about plainsong as about the Elizabethan Composers, and the prevailing ignorance was due to circumstances rather than to blindness on the part of musicians. We know so much better now that there is no excuse for going wrong; but we have no cause to be puffed up.) This manual should be of great service, not only to those who have to accompany plainsong but to Church musicians in general, seeing that the idiom of plainchant and the modal system play so prominent a part in the music of to-day. It may be well to add that the best harmonization of plainsong cannot be achieved until the player is independent of the printed page. He must be full of his subject, and sufficiently facile to be able to improvise his accompaniments. Only then will he be free to give the text its due, especially in the matter of rhythm.

'The Dance: An Historical Survey of Dancing in Europe.' By Cecil J. Sharp and A. P. Oppé.

[Halton & Truscott Smith, 30*s.*]

With no wish to belittle the authors' share of this handsome volume, one may fairly say that its chief appeal to the average reader lies in its illustrations. In addition to those in the text, there are seventy-five plates—a few in colour, the bulk in monochrome. They are drawn from a bewildering variety of sources, beautifully reproduced, and as a mixture of the curious and beautiful, the collection is one to linger over. Perhaps inevitably, the literary side of the volume hardly lives up to the title of the book. A survey of European dancing is a matter for more than one volume, and calls for research organized on an international basis. Here we have the work of one man, who was overtasked and ill during a good part of its writing, and whose predilection in favour of the folk-dance (especially that of his own country) was bound to lead to some want of proportion. The survey is divided into three sections—an introduction, dealing with the Folk Dance; a longer chapter on the Social Dance, considered century by century from the 16th down to the present; and a discussion of the Spectacular Dance. In the section on the Social Dance it is worth noting that the century calling for least treatment is the 20th—the most poverty-stricken of all. With the gradual decline of the Quadrille and the Waltz, and the coming of the Turkey Trot, the Tango, and Jazz, the historian has little more to do than write 'Ichabod.' Speaking of Jazz, Mr. Sharp reasonably doubts whether, but for the unsettlement due to the war, and the craze for dancing which set in with the Armistice,

> . . . a dance of so inferior and, in its earlier forms, so objectionable a type, would have gained a foothold in this country. . . . Looking back over a long series of social dances, from the 14th-century Basse-dances to the 19th-century Waltzes and Quadrilles, one > can but marvel what the Jazz has to do in such company. It is, moreover, the only dance of the series associated with music other than of the first order.

But this chapter ends with a justifiable note of hope based on the remarkable revival of folk-dancing that has taken place during recent years, not only in this country but also in certain parts of the Continent. Whether the revival will lead to permanent results remains to be seen. But, as Mr. Sharp points out, there is significance in the fact that so far popular taste seems to be attracted chiefly by the 17th-century dances that have survived in the earlier editions of Playford's 'Dancing Master.' 'If progress is to be made,' says Mr. Sharp, 'this, the moment when the dance was at the apex of its development, must necessarily be the point of departure.'

In regard to present-day spectacular dancing, he admits that the Russian Ballet has placed it

> . . . on altogether a higher plane so far as scenery, costume, choice and character of subject, miming, stage-production, and music are concerned.

As to the actual dancing, however, he is less sure :

> I have not noticed, for instance, that the Russian dancers have discontinued or found any substitutes for the virtuoso, acrobatic movements against which they rightly declaimed, the turned-out feet or 'point' dancing. This was perhaps inevitable. M. Fokine and his coadjutors were themselves trained in the technique, and saturated with the conventions, of the very type of dance that they essayed drastically to reform.

And he ends with the suggestion that reform may be brought about by the founding of a ballet on folk-dance technique :

> Many of the European nations could provide it. The technique of the English folk-dance, for example, is very full; it comprises a large number of different steps, arm and hand movements and gestures, and is especially rich in concerted figure-evolutions, a form of expression in the dance of which the ballet has hitherto made but little use. Here, surely, is sufficient material from which to develop a spectacular dance for the theatre which shall consist wholly of movements at once natural and expressive, and possessing the advantage for England that they are cast in the dance-idiom of our own country.

These last words may well be prophetic, for we have at least half-a-dozen composers who are also folk-song enthusiasts, and who have already shown in various ways that, given the right co-operation from the stage side, they are well qualified to found an English Ballet that would worthily crown the life-work of Cecil Sharp. 'The Musical Directory, 1925.'

[Rudall, Carte, 6*s*.]

This indispensable annual, now in its seventy-third year, contains a new feature—a list of choral and orchestral societies, London and provincial. The list is far from complete: for example, one looks in vain for mention of some of the most famous of Northern choirs. But half a loaf, &c., and now that a start has been made it ought to be possible for the Directory to be as complete in this important department as it is in others. There is a lack of consistency about the arrangement in the present issue. In some cases the names of conductor and secretary are given; in others, only one of these officials is mentioned. If space will not admit of both conductor and secretary being included, the choice should, we think, fall on the secretary, as being the official to whom correspondence should be addressed. (Addresses are not given in all cases—a serious blemish.) A complete list of this kind is so valuable that we hope the publishers will take steps betimes in order to make it exhaustive and systematic. To soloists, composers, and others wishing to get in touch with such societies, a full and well-arranged compendium would alone be worth the price of the book. As the Directory now contains also particulars of practically all the Competition Festivals, in addition to its other long-established features, it is more than ever a work that no professional musician can do without.

We have received from the Library Association the 'Subject Index to Periodicals, year 1921, section H, Music.' The Index gives a classified list of all the articles that appeared in English musical journals for that year, and is an invaluable work of reference for writers, lecturers, and all who need to turn up articles in a hurry. It may be had of the Library Association agents, Messrs. Grafton, 51, Great Russell Street, W.C., price 2*s*. 6*d*.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS

The next examination for the Choir-Training (CHM.) Diploma will take place on May 13 and 14.

Free lectures on Choir-Training at the College on May 12, at 2.30 p.m. and 6.30 p.m.

The half-yearly meeting, which took place at the College on January 24, proved a very successful reunion of Fellows, Associates, and members, and the attendance easily broke any previous record. Not only was every seat occupied, but numerous members of the College and many visitors could find only standing room and even overflowed on to the landing outside. Dr. H. W. Richards (the President) was in the chair, supported by Sir Hugh Allen, Mr. John B. McEwen (Principal of the R.A.M.), and Mr. H. Cart de Lafontaine (Vice-Presidents), Dr. H. A. Harding (hon. secretary), and the following members of the Council: Dr. P. C. Buck, Mr. E. T. Cook, Mr. G. D. Cunningham, Dr. Darke, Mr. H. F. Ellingford, Mr. Harvey Grace, Dr. Eaglefield Hull, Prof. C. H. Kitson, Dr. H. G. Ley, and Dr. Shinn.

Dr. H. W. RICHARDS: First, I should like to say how very proud I am to be placed in this position. It is entirely owing to the kindness of my friends on the Council, and not to any merit of my own. It is a proud position to occupy, and one that is prized by the heads of our profession. We want to get through the business part of the programme as soon as possible, so as to leave time for a social meeting, where the members of the Council may get to know the members of the College. We seldom have that opportunity. We do not want to know how you put the parson in his place, or any heroics of that sort, but we want to see and hear something of you. I need hardly say how greatly indebted we are to Dr. Harding for all the extra work that this departure has entailed upon him. He is always working, day and night, for the College, and I would like him to know how much we appreciate his labours on our behalf. I hear there is a fallacy current that only professional people can become members of this College. I wish to say that anyone who is interested in our work here can become a member of the College, provided he be a decent, well-living, and respectable citizen. I think Dr. Harding will see to that. If you are interested in our work I would like you to become members; you will receive the Musical Times every month, the yearly Calendar, the examination papers, and other delightful things that emanate from this Institution. One other thing I want to say, and that is how delighted we are that the Principal of the R.A.M., Mr. J. B. McEwen, and Sir Hugh Allen, the Director of the R.C.M., have been good enough to come here this morning. When we consider the important duties devolving upon the heads of great Institutions such as the R.A.M. and the R.C.M., we feel it is very good of them to find time to give us the benefit of their countenance and support. A gentleman to whom we owe great thanks for his generosity to us in the past—Mr. Cart de Lafontaine—is also with us. I can assure him that the prize-winners of his generous gifts are always marked men and women, and that there is great emulation amongst the various candidates to secure these very valuable prizes, which carry with them not only prestige but very valuable presents of books. I have only one more word to add—I hope, after this meeting, you will stay and make our informal conversazione a great success.

Dr. H. A. HARDING (hon. secretary): As you probably know, we have lately made great alterations in our Paper-Work Examinations. We have given up the Contrapuntal cross-word puzzles, figured basses, mysterious questions on fugue subjects, and all that sort of thing. You can imagine that the Hon. Secretary would very anxiously watch the result of all this, and he has done so; and he is glad to be able to state that the result is a great success from the point of view of the College, and of the candidates. The failures are now largely in the organ-playing, and not in the paper work. For the Associateship, 50 per cent. of the candidates passed in paper-work—the largest percentage I have ever known. I only want to tell you this for your encouragement and enlightenment, because I know some of you think our new regulations are very terrible; you need not fear them if you are musicians!

After the presentation of Diplomas and the Presidential Address (given in full in our February issue), Mr. H. F. ELLINGFORD, organist of St. George's Hall, Liverpool, gave a recital of the Fellowship pieces for July, 1925. The performance was listened to with intense interest, and each item received the warmest applause.

Mr. HARVEY GRACE proposed a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Ellingford, which was carried by acclamation.

Dr. BUCK: I am asked to propose a vote of thanks to our President for his admirable address and for presiding over this meeting. Years ago, for some reason always inscrutable to me, I found myself standing in his shoes, and so, when he rose to give his Presidential address, I was full of sympathy with him. I must confess that in my talks I took the simple and easy course of putting before you various ideals, knowing well that they were beyond attainment by any of us. Dr. Richards has been wiser. He has drawn on his experience of life, and has placed before us a proposition with which I find myself in entire agreement; for he has laid it down that before one is a musician he must be a man. Dr. Richards was elected to the Council by the members of this College—that is, yourselves—in recognition of his acknowledged position as a musician; we, the Council, nominated him as our President in recognition of his qualities as a man. I will ask you to show your agreement with what I have said with hearty acclamation.

The PRESIDENT: I have had occasion in the past to be grateful to Dr. Buck for many things in life and conversation, for his great help, and, above all, for his great friendship, which I value enormously. Dr. Buck has said many kind things about me: I can only try to live up to that standard.

[We have received the following from one who styles himself 'An Outsider']:

A CONVERSAZIONE

The President and other members of the Council then led the way to a large room on the uppermost floor of the building—a room which has possibly had its terrors in the past for many members of the company, for we were given to understand that it was the Theoretical Examination Room. On this occasion the spinning of wonderful theories gave way to the flow of soul, and the silence of studious thought was replaced by the buzz of conversation. Even the usual furniture had disappeared, that there might be standing room for the great concourse of Fellows, Associates, Members, and visitors who were the guests of the College. As the company arrived each, he or she, on entering the room received a 'shake' and a hearty greeting from the President, and quickly felt at home.

The members of the Council engaged many visitors in conversation while the cups that cheer went quickly round, and incense from the fragrant weed scented the rarefied air of these heights sublime. There was no music except that of the 'vox humana,' no organ but the organ of speech; yet the 'voix celeste' of the ladies blended agreeably with the manly 'bourdon' of the choirmasters in the general ripple of conversation. In short, there were no speeches, but a great deal of talk. Everybody seemed to know everybody else, or to know somebody whom somebody else knew, and there was an endless exchange of inquiry and reminiscence. An outside observer formed the impression that the 'Social' served the purpose of bringing the members of the College into mutual touch, of renewing old friendships, and initiating new ones, of helping to create a collegiate feeling and to foster a sense of corporate life.

Dr. Harding will be congratulated upon the very satisfactory result of an experiment to which he has given a great deal of time and trouble—an experiment which proved an undoubted success and will certainly be repeated.

CORRECTION.—In the Examiners' Reports of the recent examinations, page 142, February Musical Times, Associate paper-work, 'Addition of Bass to Melody':

'Candidates should be more careful about their barring.'

For 'barring' read 'bowing.'

NEWCASTLE BACH CHOIR

The Choir paid its thirteenth visit to Newcastle Cathedral on February 7, and gave a recital of Bach Cantatas—'Thou Guide of Israel,' 'Sing Praises,' 'Watch and Pray,' and 'Praise Jehovah.' The soloists were Miss Ida Cowey, Miss Annie Lawton, and four members of the Cathedral Choir—Messrs. S. E. Hattle, H. Frater, W. H. Hobkirk, and A. L. Lewis. Mr. Alfred M. Wall led the orchestra, Mr. William Ellis was at the organ, and Dr. Whittaker conducted. The programme book was, as usual, a model, containing all the necessary information set forth clearly and attractively. A recital of this type—merely one of many that Dr. Whittaker's singers undertake—makes us wish that a body of about forty or fifty voices could be selected from the London Bach Choir for the purpose of performing the Cantatas. This choir-within-a-choir idea has already been adopted by Mr. Kennedy Scott, whose accomplished Oriana Singers are a small force drawn from the choir of that name. There is far more justification for such a step in the case of the Bach Choir, because at its full strength so large a choir cannot reasonably undertake the cantatas—the very works that many of the public would welcome a chance of hearing with something like the right proportions of voices and instruments. (We add that at the Newcastle performance the choir numbered forty-eight—twelve to each of the four parts; and the orchestra was made up of four violins, four violas, two violoncellos, one double-bass, two flutes, two oboes, three [Bach] trumpets, and drums.)

LONDON SOCIETY OF ORGANISTS

On January 24, the London Society of Organists held its annual general meeting at St. Peter's Mission House, Wilton Road, S.W., preceded by a social gathering. The President for 1924 (Dr. J. E. Borland) was in the chair. Elections for 1925 were: president, Mr. W. Wolstenholme; hon. treasurer, Mr. J. Percy Baker; hon. secretary, Dr. J. Warriner; hon. auditors, Mr. G. H. Halliday and Mr. R. F. Tyler. The following were elected to fill vacancies created on the Council by retirement under Rule 26: Dr. J. E. Borland, Dr. C. Hazlehurst, Messrs. E. A. Coombs (one year), W. Ratcliffe, A. R. Saunders, and John E. West. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to those who had carried on the work throughout the year.

THE CHAPEL ROYAL: DEDICATION OF THE NEW ORGAN

The organ presented by the King, and built by Messrs. Hill and Norman & Beard, was dedicated on February 8 by the Bishop of London. The King and Queen were present. The hymn, 'All people that on earth do dwell,' sung unaccompanied, opened the service, and the dedication was followed by an organ solo, Handel's 'Largo.' The anthem was Vaughan Williams's setting of 'Let us now praise famous men,' and the final voluntary Franck's A minor Choral, a piece chosen specially with a view to displaying certain qualities of the instrument. Mr. Stanley Roper was of course at the organ. The choir was augmented for the occasion by a number of the members of the Association of Old Chapel Royal Boys. (Some of these veterans had sung at the Jubilee Service of Queen Victoria, and one at least was a fellow chorister of Sullivan.) These Old Boys occupied the Strangers' Gallery. Report says that the new instrument is admirably designed for the building. It bears the inscription:

TO THE GREATER GLORY OF GOD AND IN MEMORY OF THE LONG LINE OF DISTINGUISHED MUSICIANS WHO HAVE BEEN ASSOCIATED WITH HIS MAJESTY'S CHAPELS ROYAL, THIS ORGAN IS SET UP BY HIS MAJESTY KING GEORGE V., 8TH FEBRUARY, 1925.

This gracious act of his Majesty in presenting an organ in memory of a group of fine English composers and organists has given deep satisfaction to the musical public and profession, and above all to those who have to do with church and organ music. Following is the specification:

Piston to be placed over the Great Manual for the same purpose.
Four composition Pedals to Great Organ.
Great Organ Pistons to Pedal compositions.
Swell and Choir Pedals.

At the second concert of the City of London Choir College at Bishopsgate Institute, on January 29, Parts 2 and 3 of the 'Christmas' Oratorio, Vaughan Williams's 'Fantasia on Christmas Carols,' madrigals, &c., were sung, with the assistance of adult members of St. Paul's Cathedral, Westminster Abbey, and other choirs. The boys alone sang three-part arrangements of 'The Silver Swan,' 'How merrily we live,' &c. Mr. Francis W. Sutton conducted.

In our November issue we mentioned an offer made by Mr. J. Barham Johnson and Mr. Francis J. Hill to give violoncello and organ recitals at churches in the Eastern counties during the Christmas vacation. The recitals were free on application by an incumbent, and were designed to illustrate the development of instrumental church music. We are glad to hear that the enterprise was so well received that many more recitals were applied for than could be given in the fortnight available. Nine churches were visited—Ketton; Exton; All Saints', Stamford; St. Mary's, Great Bealings; Wymondham Abbey; All Saints', Horstead; Swaffham; Bourne Abbey; and Langham. The programme, which served as illustrations to a lecture, was as follows: Sonata, Marcello; Organ Concerto, Handel; Violoncello Sonata, Boccherini; Air with variations, for organ, S. S. Wesley; Symphonic Variations for violoncello, Boëllmann; Choral No. 2, Franck; Violoncello Concerto, Elgar. The recitals were so much enjoyed that a further tour will be undertaken in the summer vacation, when other East Anglian centres will be visited. Correspondence on the subject should be addressed to Mr. Hill at the Music School, Marlborough College, Wilts.

Bach's 'Christmas' Oratorio (Parts 1 and 2) was performed at Lincoln Cathedral on January 28, by a choir and orchestra of two hundred and fifty, conducted by Dr. G. J. Bennett, the soloists being Miss Millicent Russell and Messrs. F. Booth and C. H. Lofthouse, with Mr. W. W. Hewitt at the organ. The Oratorio was followed by Beethoven's Violin Concerto (Miss Murray Lambert). The service also included Byrd's 'This day Christ was born, and an arrangement by Dr. Bennett of 'The First Nowell.'

The organ at Hampstead Garden Suburb Free Church was re-opened on February 10, when Dr. Alfred Hollins gave a recital. The programme included the player's Concert Overture No. 2, Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D, Wolstenholme's 'Cantilène,' and an improvisation. Miss Ethel Hailstone sang. The organ—opened in part in 1912—is now complete, and is a three-manual of twenty-three stops and twenty-seven couplers, pistons, &c. Builders, Messrs. Hill and Norman & Beard.

Mr. Ambrose P. Porter has been appointed to Lichfield Cathedral, in succession to the late Dr. J. B. Lott. Mr. Porter has for some years been organist and choirmaster at St. Matthias's, Richmond, Surrey, where he has organized many notable musical services and given organ recitals of outstanding interest. For some years he was pupil-assistant at Gloucester Cathedral. He has recently been appointed Professor of Harmony, Form, and Aural-Training at Kneller Hall.

At St. Stephen's, Bow, E.3, special Lenten music will be given each Sunday evening at 6.30 p.m. On March 15 one of Holst's 'Two Psalms' will be sung, on March 22 Bach's 'I wrestle and pray,' and on March 29, Mendelssohn's 'Hear my prayer.' On Palm Sunday, April 5, and again on Good Friday, April 10, the 'St. John' Passion will be performed at 7 p.m.

At a carol service and organ recital given at Andover Parish Church on New Year's Eve, a collection was made for a novel object—to pay the expenses of taking the choirboys to Winchester Cathedral in order that they might hear the Cathedral choir sing. We hope the young Andoverians enjoyed their busman's holiday, and profited by it.

The 'St. Matthew' Passion will be performed at Southwark Cathedral on March 28, at 3 o'clock. The London Symphony Orchestra will play. Tickets for reserved seats may be had from the Precentor, the Rectory, Sumner Street, S.E.1. (Stamped envelope.)

On March 14, at 3, the City Temple Choral Society will sing Rossini's 'Stabat Mater' and Bach's 'God's time is the best' (an unusual coupling!). Mr. Allan Brown will conduct, and Mr. G. D. Cunningham will be at the organ.

Dr. A. H. Mann, King's College, Cambridge, contemplates writing a life of William Crotch, and will be grateful to readers who can help him with particulars of MSS., letters, portraits, or any other matter that is likely to be of use.

'The Hymn of Praise' will be sung by the Hampstead Garden Suburb Free Church Choir on March 10, directed by Mr. William C. Webb, with Dr. Harold Darke at the organ.

Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper have just erected a new organ in Howe Bridge Parish Church, Atherton, Manchester—a two manual of thirty-four stops.

Selections from Handel's 'Deborah' were sung at High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, on February 15, directed by Mr. Blyton Dobson.

Letters to the Editor

NOTATION OF THE HORN: SOME ALTERED MEANINGS

SIR,—It is sad to find that Mr. Blandford has not yet grasped the purport of my article. In your current number he says:

> 'The original point at issue, as I understand it, was that "cuivré" has changed its meaning; and this implies the general discarding of the old, and the adoption of the new meaning.'

In the first place, the original point at issue concerned 'bouché' and the + just as much as 'cuivré.' Secondly, I should have imagined that even a cursory glance at my article would have shown that the discarding of the old meanings of the three indications was not generally adopted. In my first paragraph I said, that > '. . . trouble begins when half the speakers or writers cling to the original meaning, while the other half persist in ignoring it,' and the rest of the article was mainly taken up by illustrations of this trouble. D'Indy, in his 'Chant de la Cloche,' undoubtedly adopts an altered meaning for his +. Does Mr. Blandford seriously contend that this implies the general discarding of the old meaning? As a matter of fact, I can take from my shelves five scores, each with a different meaning attached to the sign.

It is not difficult to account for the altered meaning that some have given to the cuivré. Wagner, except on one occasion, never marked the cuivré on open notes, although of course it is at times implied, and hence in some minds the bouché and the cuivré would be inseparably connected. The exception is in 'Tristan,' for the horns on the stage. And it is to be noted that Gevaert, in an extract from the scene, translates the Sehr stark as 'Pavillons en l'air' (with upturned bells), the only term he gives to connote the cuivré. Forty years ago there was at least one man who knew what Wagner meant by his stark!

Further confusion has arisen, because Wagner elected to alter the meaning of his +. In 'Tristan' it was equivalent to a simple bouché (gestopft), but in 'The Mastersingers' and 'The Ring' it implied both bouché and cuivré (stark geblasen). Mr. Blandford denies any alteration, and would therefore have us believe that (say) the mit Dämpfern und stark angeblasen and the gestopft und stark blasend of 'Parsifal' (pp. 328 and 352) were intended to signify no more than plain gedämpft or gestopft. His attitude then—at any rate as regards Wagner—much resembles that of Ricci, who considers bouché and cuivré as synonymous. To justify his attitude your correspondent adduces Richter's treatment of the Master's horn parts. The celebrated conductor apparently allowed his players every latitude as regards choice of crooks, &c., 'provided that the result sounded right.' In spite of the mysterious vagueness of the 'right,' I must confess that I am not convinced by Mr. Blandford's logic.

Having previously stated that a particular effect was 'of course only possible on the stopped notes of the [natural] Horn's compass,' Mr. Forsyth says: 'The French either mark the note cuivré or put the words sons bouchés over the passage,' i.e., the Frenchman Georges Bizet would have obtained the same effect if he had put sons bouchés above his horn parts in the 'Carillon.' It seems to me that the only possible interpretation of Mr. Forsyth's sentence is that the author looked upon the two terms as being synonymous. Mr. Blandford lacks confidence in this interpretation, because he knows the player from whom Mr. Forsyth derived much of his information. Again I regret that I am unable to follow Mr. Blandford's reasoning, though marvelling at his reliance on the 'party as knows another party.' Instead of giving his own valuable experiences as regards the cuivré, he proceeds to cite a friend in Paris 'who has played the horn professionally.' I hope the friend does not agree with Mr. Pegge's slovenly habit of fully stopping every bouché note, indifferent to the intentions of the composer! Instead of drawing his own deductions from Wagner's scores as to the meaning of stark, Mr. Blandford prefers to recall the table-talk of the late Adolf Borsdorf. He has doubts as to the meaning of a straightforward sentence because he knows the source from which Mr. Forsyth quaffed: the same source, presumably, that supplied the entirely erroneous information as to the E between the 2nd and 3rd harmonics being impossible on a hand-horn (vide Mr. Blandford's erudite article in the January number).

Mr. Pegge's excuses for Widor are more ingenious than convincing. And I would point out that the French composer's recantation is rather a grudging one. He will allow that virtuosi can 'brass' open notes without the aid of the hand, but only in fortissimo passages. Evidently the accomplishment is beyond the power of the rank and file of horn-blowers, in p or mf passages!

In conclusion I would suggest that however faithfully the traditional meaning of cuivré may be preserved in Paris, some players in England associate it with the altered meaning. In his excellent little book, 'A Practical Guide to the Modern Orchestra' (1912), Dr. James Lyon acknowledges his indebtedness to his friend, Ernest Bryson (who undoubtedly knows something of the orchestra), and 'many orchestral players in various parts of the country.' Now, Dr. Lyon questions Widor's method of producing the (altered) cuivré, and recommends the player attacking the note below the written one, and raising the pitch by means of the hand, as being safer. It is hardly likely that any but practical cornists would have suggested this!—Yours, &c.,

TOM S. WOTTON.

St. Leonards-on-Sea.
February, 1925.

P.S.—I am sorry to say that I do not know what Wagner intended by his 'Alto-Oboe,' nor whether any conscientious conductor has employed it, nor where information concerning it can be found. Probably, if it were a purely musical question, such as whether the Master preferred his chops underdone, or his eggs hard-boiled, his numerous biographers would assist us.—T. S. W.

LONDON CHORALISM

SIR,—We should like to thank you for your stand for choral societies in London against the slighting reference of Sir Richard Terry which you quoted in your 'Occasional Notes' in the February issue.

May I say that the Westminster Choral Society, under Mr. Vincent Thomas, revived Stanford's 'Stabat Mater' and gave three performances in three successive seasons? Sir Charles Stanford, who was present at the first and second performances, wrote to the choir a letter of deep appreciation.

This Society, during its existence of six seasons, has produced at least twenty new works by British composers; and on March 4, at its concert at Central Hall, it is giving, inter alia, the first choral performance of Stanford's choral songs set to the poems in Tennyson's 'The Princess.'—Yours, &c.,

J. A. TRINDER.

[We have received other letters in defence of London choralism.—EDITOR.]

'THE MACCRIMMONS OF SKYE'

SIR,—The following may be of some interest to any who read, in the January number, Mr. R. C. B. Gardner's fascinating article on 'The MacCrimmons of Skye.'

About the year 1888 I used to have lessons on the bagpipe—or, to be precise, the practice-chanter on which all pipe-music is first learned. Duncan MacDougall, a good specimen of a Highlander, was my 'pipe-master.' He won the gold medal at the Northern Meeting at Inverness in 1873, and was a fine player of marches and reels. The pipes fairly sparkled when he played a march, and he was no mean performer of a pibroch. He was always insistent that I should watch his fingers instead of trying to pick up the sound by ear. He knew a great deal of the MacCrimmon tradition, and among many interesting facts he told me that the following—as well as I can remember—was the first thing a beginner had to learn. It may encourage any present-day impatient pianoforte student to know that these early pipers—usually working in caves—were allowed six months in which to learn to play, with the proper cutting sound, the little group of three quick notes; while two whole years were supposed to be necessary before the budding piper could accomplish the following 'dirrum' effect common at the end of many tunes:

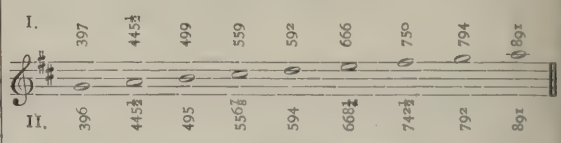
The technical difficulty of this latter figure lies in the fact that it is performed entirely by two rapid movements of the little finger of the lower hand (most players use the right, a few the left, as the lower hand), as follows:

(1.) Strike the G hole with the little finger;
(2.) Curl the finger rapidly, and draw it back across the hole, and clear of it.

As the lower hand always covers or strikes the holes with the second finger joints—not the tips of the fingers—the first A of this figure is caused by the slight gap between the 'strike' and the 'curl,' and the second G is the result of the tip of the finger momentarily closing the G hole as it passes clear of the chanter.

Regarding the scale of the pipes, the following is given in W. L. Manson's book on 'The Highland Bagpipe':

Pitch.—C = 528.



I. = correct equal temperament.
II. = pipe-scale vibrations.

It will be seen that the A's are correct; B, C♯, F♯, and both G's are flat; D and E are sharp. The upper G can be made somewhat sharper by opening the F hole together with G and E.

It was good reading to see how Mr. Gardner praised the Pibroch. It is the 'symphony' of the pipes, and demands great skill and artistry in performance, and on the part of the listener a knowledge and perception not easily acquired without study of the technical and musical peculiarities of this style of composition. Three years ago a piper played in the hall while my host and hostess and myself dined. The Pibroch was 'The Gathering of Clan Chattan,' and the piper—a magnificent Pibroch player—rounded off the piece with the Urlar or groundwork. This is as it should be, though the custom is in danger of dying out at competitions where time saving is important.

The Southerner may smile, but I have seldom been as thrilled by any other piece of music. (N.B.—To intending correspondents, please don't, but forgive.—C. M.)

Old Duncan MacDougall, before-mentioned, was a great character, and when piper to the late Marquis of Breadalbane he tried to give a lesson or two to the late King of Sweden and to Sir John Stainer! The latter attempted to play the notes on the chanter, while MacDougall blew over Stainer's shoulder into the bag.

The great amount of time required to learn the pipes—properly—perhaps imparted to MacDougall an undoubted and supreme contempt for the technical difficulties of other instruments.

A local 'Reel and Strathspey' Society acquired a double-bass instrument. This did not come North until the day of the concert. There was no one who had ever played it, but MacDougall volunteered. I offered to tune the 'ma-ssheen,' then I explained what the notes were. 'Och! that's coot enough,' said our friend. He begged me to remain near him at the concert. Needless to say, there were no right notes. At last I saw my chance and said, 'Stick to that note, MacDougall, it's coming right in another ten bars.' Of course, just at that point he moved off on to another open string with an impish smile of undisguised superiority. But—they're a grand race, the pipers.—Yours, &c.,

THAT 'COINCIDENCE'

SIR,—That which you describe as coincidence (on p. 141 of your February issue) is merely an accident—nothing more. 'Pedagogue' of the Musical Mirror and 'Yorke Bannard' of the Monthly Musical Record are one and the same person. Two articles were written, one for the Record on 'Children's Orchestral Concerts' and one for the Mirror on 'Children's Concert Programmes.' Unfortunately I forwarded a retained (copy) MS. of the Record article to the Mirror instead of the one intended, and did not detect the error until your paragraph was brought to my notice. Similarity of title plus carelessness contributed to the error. —Yours, &c., YORKE BANNARD.

THE LATE FRANCIS E. BARRETT: FRIEND AND CRITIC

SIR,—My personal acquaintance with Francis Barrett was of comparatively short duration. Yet, long before I could identify him, I regarded him as a friend.

From my salad days of composition, and earliest years as a conductor, his criticisms in the Morning Post invariably —whether they censured or praised—had some suggestive, stimulating inference, that corrected the novice or encouraged the more mature technician. His kindly justice must surely have been a help to the artistic equipoise of many musicians; for always there was the unmistakable voice of sincerity sounding in his columns.

During my period as musical director at Harrogate, Francis Barrett was one of the critics who accepted the Corporation's invitation to survey the then-existing scheme of music there. Most generously he surrendered some days of his annual holiday, and spent them in assiduously examining every aspect of our activities. It must have been dull for him, who had heard every great artist and every great orchestra, to listen patiently to a fledgling choir and the unrehearsed efforts of a municipal band. But when it was hinted to him that any absences on his part would be perfectly well understood, he said with decision, 'But I like it. I want to help with any comment or suggestion I can make.' He never missed a bar of music during his stay.

Because he liked the scheme of the orchestral concerts for children, he instituted a Barrett Prize for advanced observation, which was peculiarly attractive to music-teachers and children, and yet another proof of his unremitting effort for the growth of musical culture.

To know him only in print was a musician's loss. The generous flow of wisdom, deep knowledge, and charming boyish gaiety of this kindly man could not but endear him to his friends.

Besides being a critic, he was a composer of gifts. He has left behind him a score of genuine value and appeal.

Also, to his lasting honour and credit, he has his record as an insistent advocate for British music and musicians.—Yours, &c., HOWARD CARR.

GERMAN SONG TRANSLATIONS

SIR,—On any question concerning music I would not venture to dissent from your criticisms or judgment, and it is only with diffidence that I do so in the matter of words for music. I am deeply interested in the review of 'Schubert's Songs Translated' (p. 131), for the puerile words in the only edition with which I am acquainted (Augener's) have made the songs in some instances almost unsingable. Therefore I welcome any translation which does not err on the side of sloppiness, and which at the same time is written in good English. But I cannot follow the reviewer in applauding the substitution of 'elm' for 'linden.' After all, linden is a good old English word for the lime-tree, and although I am not prepared to quote off-hand many references to this tree in poetry, yet I think they will certainly be found. Here is one I do remember, from Matthew Arnold:

> 'And air-swept lindens yield
> Their scent, and rustle down their perfum'd showers
> Of bloom on the bent grass where I am laid,
> And bower me from the August sun with shade.'

Even more at sea is the writer when he says, 'The linden is not much of a tree.' Surely he is confusing it with some other tree. The lime or linden is one of our handsomest trees, and grows to a good height. Its sweet-scented blooms every one knows—and how the bees love them. Then, as to its timber, I believe it is much in request for fine cabinet work. So much for the facts. I would not mind the alteration, however, if 'elm' were a better 'singable' word, and this I cannot admit. You may say this is but the difference 'twixt tweedledum and tweedledee, but 'a lime beside the well' would read just as aptly as 'an elm, &c.,' and would be nearer the original.—Yours, &c.,

Sixty Years Ago

From the Musical Times of March, 1865:

MANCHESTER.—At Mr. C. Hallé's fourteenth concert, Spohr's 'Last Judgment' was given. We are glad to find that our predictions respecting Spohr's oratorios are likely to be realised even more rapidly than we anticipated. Not only are the conductors of sacred performances beginning to repair their neglect of his works, but their effect upon a general audience—as proved by the recent performance of the 'Last Judgment' by the Sacred Harmonic Society in London—is such as to justify their taking permanent rank with the great oratorios of Handel and Mendelssohn.

SHEERNESS.—The Choral Society gave a very successful performance of Handel's 'The Messiah,' with full orchestral accompaniments, on Monday, February 20, in the Co-operative Hall. Mr. Frederick Bridge, assistant-organist of Rochester Cathedral, presided in a very able manner at the harmonium.

The Amateurs' Exchange

Under this heading we insert, free of charge, announcements by amateur musicians who wish to co-operate with others.

Advanced pianist wishes to meet violinist and 'cellist for mutual practice. Sonatas and trios.—S. T., c/o Musical Times.

Lady violinist wishes to meet two or three other stringed instrumentalists for practice of chamber music. Watford district, or easy reach.—M.A., c/o Musical Times.

Keen amateur orchestral players wanted to assist in oratorio and classical instrumental work, at Stroud Green, Finsbury Park, N.—B. J. ORSMAN, 184, Muswell Hill Road, N.10 (Mountview 3573).

Accompanist (honorary) wanted for Girls' Singing Class held at Battersea on Monday evenings. Apply, Miss PRICE, 29, Plough Road, Battersea, S.W.11. Also one for Poplar. Apply, Miss M. BARBOUR, Women's Presbyterian Settlement, 56, East India Dock Road, Poplar, E.14.

Baritone wishes to meet good accompanist for mutual practice, one night weekly.—J. L., 31, Preston Road, Hull.

All instruments (amateur) wanted to augment West London Co-operative Orchestral Society. Extensive library of high-class music. Rehearsals, Sundays, 11 a.m., at 245, Dawes Road, Fulham.—Conductor, JOHN MASON, 9, Wardo Avenue, Fulham, S.W.6.

Baritone (residing in N.W. district) wishes to meet young pianist for mutual practice.—H. H., c/o Musical Times.

'Cellist wishes to join quartet or other combination for chamber music. Good library. London, S.W. district.—J. G. W., c/o Musical Times.

Pianist wishes to meet violinist or singer for mutual practice.—W. A. GEBHARD, 253, Aston Road, Birmingham.

Pianist (lady) wishes to meet violinist and 'cellist for mutual practice. W. Hampstead district.—L. B., c/o Musical Times.

Pianist and violinist wish to meet 'cellist for practice of classical trios.—I. B., 18, Normanton Road, Clifton, Bristol.

Amateur conductor is prepared to coach amateur operatic or choral society (operatic preferred). London or suburbs.—H. TREVOR, c/o Musical Times.

Grafton Philharmonic Society is rehearsing the 'St. Matthew' Passion, to be performed at Clapham Congregational Church, Grafton Square, Old Town, Clapham, S.W.4, on April 8, at 8. The Society will welcome help in all parts from those who know the work, or who possess good voices and ability to read at sight. Rehearsals in the Church Parlour at the rear of the Church, on Thursdays, at 8 p.m.—HENRY F. HALL, 'Forest End,' Forest Hill Road, S.E.23.

Lady pianist, good sight-reader, wishes to meet advanced students for the practice of chamber music—trios and quintets.—'MUSICAL,' 6, Wellington Terrace, Bayswater, W.2.

Double-bass player required for amateur orchestra in West Ham, E.15. Practice, Friday evenings. Orchestra's own instrument.—S. L., 160, Clements Road, East Ham, E.6.

Stockwell Orchestral Society has vacancies for good instrumentalists. Meet Tuesdays, at Paradise Road, Clapham.—F. BYARD, 12, Sibella Road, S.W.4.

Highgate Village Orchestra has vacancies for good violins, violas, flute, oboe, bassoon, horn, and cornet. Practices at North Hill Hall, 33, North Hill, Highgate, N.6, on Tuesdays, 8 to 10 p.m. This season's programme includes Beethoven's fifth Symphony and 'Prometheus' Overture, Butterworth's 'Shropshire Lad,' and German's 'Merrie England.'—Conductor, Mr. PETER FARQUHARSON, Heather Hill, Bloomfield Road, Highgate, N.6.

P. S. A. meeting, North Hill Hall, 33, North Hill, Highgate, N.6, every Sunday, 3 to 4.15 p.m. Ladies and gentlemen are invited to join the orchestra. Practices Tuesdays, 8 to 10 p.m.—Conductor, Mr. PETER FARQUHARSON, Heather Hill, Bloomfield Road, Highgate, N.6.

UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH

THE FREDERICK NIECKS MEMORIAL

In addition to the bronze portrait plaque to be unveiled at the Historical Concert on March 5, it is intended to institute an annual prize in musical history. There are at present no prizes in the Faculty of Music. For this purpose it is desired to raise £150, of which the sum of £60 is still required. Subscriptions are being received by Miss Agnes Johnston, 4, Coates Place, Edinburgh.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

The programme of the students' organ recital given in the Duke's Hall on February 2 was admirably varied in every way, the items for the organ being interspersed with violin, 'cello, and vocal solos. The organ pieces included the Prelude in B minor, the Fugue in D, and the first movement of the Trio-Sonata in E flat by Bach, along with the Scherzo from Guilmant's fifth Sonata—all of which were well played. Special mention must be made of the brilliant performance of the Allegro from Vierne's second Symphony by Mr. Bertram Orsman, of Franck's Final in B flat by Mr. Owen Franklin, and of the organ playing of Mr. Eric Brough. Amongst the other items were three of the rarely heard 'Bagatelles' for strings and organ by Dvořák, two of his Biblical Songs, sung by Miss Ama Hubble, and the Prelude and Gavotte for violin (unaccompanied) by Bach, admirably played by Miss Ivy Rainier.

On January 28 and February 4, two lectures were given by Mr. B. J. Dale on 'Henry Purcell' and 'Brahms.' In the lecture upon Purcell, in order to give a clearer insight into the work of the composer, Mr. Dale dealt at some length with the various stages of musical evolution from early days down to the time of Purcell, referring also to the changes which political phases such as the Commonwealth and the Restoration produced in the music of their time. Purcell's technique and methods of presenting his art were analysed, and examples of the most noteworthy points of style in his writing were given. Stress was laid on the fact that Purcell would never be appreciated at his true worth until his works were made easily accessible, rather than allowed to remain the preserve of antiquaries. The illustrations included selections from his choral music, songs, and music for harpsichord and strings. In the Brahms lecture, Mr. Dale dealt in some detail with the formative period of Brahms's life as having an important bearing upon the period of his maturity. He described the conditions of musical life in Germany during Brahms's youth, showing how he held aloof from the tendencies of the new German school of Liszt and Wagner. The various aspects of Brahms's invention and technique were analysed, and the conclusion was drawn that the results achieved completely justified the rigid conservatism of the composer, whose work to-day, by reason of its individuality and sincerity, still commands the undiminished respect and admiration of musicians. A number of vocal and instrumental illustrations were given, including a selection of the later pianoforte pieces played by Mr. John Pauer.

On February 11 and 18, two lectures were given by Mr. Frederick Keel on 'Music in the time of Queen Elizabeth,' and 'Dr. Arne.' In the first lecture the speaker referred to the popularity of the art in Elizabethan times, when music, in addition to that of the minstrels and the wandering musicians, was a part of the ordinary education of gentlemen and gentlewomen, and was also largely practised by other classes. Reference was also made to the chief instruction books of the period, and to characteristic musical terms and expressions. Various forms of musical composition were described, several being illustrated. The examples included madrigals, pieces of virginal music, and a selection of songs, originally set with lute accompaniment, sung by the lecturer.

In his lecture upon Dr. Arne, Mr. Keel gave some account of Arne's early days and of his work both as a teacher of singing and as a violinist. After describing the state of musical affairs in England subsequent to the death of Purcell, and the influence of Handel and his connection with the Italian Opera, the lecturer referred to Arne's early works for the theatre, his songs for Vauxhall and Ranelagh Gardens, and also his works for harpsichord and other instruments. The illustrations included a selection of songs, a Trio-Sonata for harpsichord and strings, and two Harpsichord Sonatas played by Mr. Harold Craxton.

The R.A.M. Club held its Annual General Meeting at the Academy on January 31, the president, Dr. Charles Macpherson, taking the chair. The announcement that Sir Alexander Mackenzie had accepted an invitation to become the new president was received with acclamation. The first social evening of the Club for the New Year took place in the Duke's Hall on February 21, when Miss Harriet Cohen, Miss Elsie Owen, and Mr. John Booth collaborated in a delightful musical programme.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The first half of the term has provided quite an attractive variety of concerts and other performances, including three orchestral programmes and five representations of the late Sir Charles Stanford's opera, 'Shamus O'Brien.' Of the orchestral concerts two will be noticed in a later issue; the other concert, given by the Second Orchestra and the senior members of the Conducting Class, enjoyed the distinction of introducing a new composition, written and conducted by a College student. The work, a Theme and Variations for Orchestra, by Guy Warrack, was conducted by Mr. Harold Davidson. It proved to be musically interesting, poetical and sensitive, with contemplative moments rather more convincing than the attempts at gaiety. With slight compression, easily achieved by reducing the number of variations to six or seven, and a little more continuity in the performance (some of the pauses between the numbers seemed unnecessarily long), these Variations might well attract the attention of our distinguished professional orchestras.

The programme included also Elgar's 'Enigma' Variations, conducted by Dr. Malcolm Sargent; Schubert's 'Unfinished' Symphony, conducted by Messrs. Patrick Hadley and Gideon Fagan; Mendelssohn's 'Hebrides' Overture, conducted by Mr. Guy Warrack (the composer of the new work mentioned above); and César Franck's Variations for Pianoforte and Orchestra, played by Miss Josephine Dalmaine and conducted by Mr. Constant Lambert. It is interesting to note that, possibly attracted by the new work and by interest in the task confronting the young conductors, there was a very large audience.

The production of 'Shamus O'Brien' by the Opera Class was on a very complete scale, and was rewarded with a generous tribute of appreciation from Lady Stanford and other members of the composer's family. Four performances were given in the first instance, two casts taking two performances each, and a fifth performance was made the occasion of an experiment of a very special and exhilarating kind. Some six or seven hundred children chosen from about thirty of the London County Council Schools formed the entire audience, by invitation of the Director, Sir Hugh Allen, and with the co-operation of Mr. G. H. Gater, Chief Education Officer of the London County Council. A smaller orchestra was employed than at the other performances, which curiously enough had the effect of giving point to a good deal of delightful detail which the larger number of players had occasionally obscured. Mr. Claude Smith-Dodsworth, a student of the College, conducted, and from time to time Mr. S. P. Waddington delighted the children with short conversations on the opera and those Irish customs and superstitions which play a large part in the development of the plot. To many of this novel audience an opera was a new experience, and there was no question as to the keen enjoyment and rapt attention with which the music and dialogue were followed. The hearty cheers of the children at the close, given on the initiative of Dr. J. E. Borland, were a fine recompense to the organizers of the experiment.

The first Patrons' Fund Rehearsal of the term was given on January 30 for executive artists. The performers on this occasion were Miss Betty Humby and Mr. Jean Pougnet, of the Royal Academy of Music; Miss Annette Blackwell, of the Royal College of Music; Mr. Edern Jones, of the Guildhall School of Music; and Miss Tessa Richardson, a private pupil of Mr. Fraser Gange. All these artists made full use of their opportunities, creating a very favourable impression on a large attendance. The next rehearsal, as already announced, marks a new departure, being given at Birmingham with the Birmingham Municipal Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Adrian C. Boult. It is arranged for the morning of March 3, and will take place at the Birmingham and Midland Institute.

At the Westminster Choral Society's concert (Central Hall), on March 4, at 8, the first choral performance of Stanford's 'The Princess' will be given. The programme includes also Bach's 'Blessing, glory,' and Brahms's 'Liebeslieder Walzer.'

THE COVENT GARDEN MUSEUM

Thanks to the industry and intelligent interest of Mr. Richard Northcote, the historian of our major opera house, London possesses to-day an opera museum, more modest perhaps, but not less interesting, than the collections at La Scala and Paris. It is, of course, a collection of shadows—all decent museums are ghostly places. An opera museum is the shadow of shadows, for the actress and celebrated tenors interest the public not when they are themselves, but when they are Tosca or Desdemona, Siegfried or Radames. But these shadows speak to us from the past with no uncertain voice. 'I cannot sing to-night, Mr. Gye; you must alter the bill.' This is the writing of Adelina Patti, and at least not less characteristic of the diva than the many photographs of the collection. The photographs justify to some extent the endearing terms in which some of her contemporaries addressed her. She was 'my adorable Patti' to Rossini, but we know that the 'adorable' Patti had a temper. And there is a receipt from the adorable singer for £840, which shows that even these divinities of the theatre did not scorn the good things of the earth—or their equivalent in cash. A lover of good things was undoubtedly Rossini, who is heard here thanking his correspondent Costa for a cheese—a 'Chidor' cheese—worthy of a 'Bach, a Handel, or a Cimarosa!' The old gourmet knew how a good cheese should be treated. He ate of it 'for three consecutive days, moistening it with the best wines of my cellar.'

Different feelings are aroused by the letters of Berlioz and his wife, Harriet Smithson. Berlioz writes about the performance at Covent Garden of 'Benvenuto Cellini,' and is very worried because he learns that the chorus consists of only sixty-five singers, which is not enough for this composer of immense scores. Should he write to Mr. Costa? The copying of the parts is also a cause for anxiety. Yet 'Benvenuto Cellini' was performed one night only. Poor Harriet Smithson writes the lines:

> 'How far that little candle throws its beams
> So shines a good deed in a naughty world,' and signs 'H. C. Berlioz-Smithson.' That is only a commonplace, but it has the profound sadness of certain music-hall songs. In a life so steeped in tragedy as hers, there was surely no room for 'naughtiness.'

The historian will find other things to admire—the so-called 'Brickler's bill' of 1767, announcing that Miss Brickler will sing a favourite song accompanied by Mr. Dibdin on a new instrument 'call'd Piano Forte'; the letter of Smart calling together his choir boys for the ceremony of the Christening of Princess Beatrice in 1857; the first bill of 'Fidelio,' conducted by Bishop, in 1827; autographs of Mario and Grisi, of Debussy and Wagner; photographs of great and small artists; a great picture of a forgotten tenor, Templeton; another picture of a Royal command performance, with Queen Victoria and Palmerston; the pass issued in 1815 for the Prince Regent's box; the pass used by Charles Dickens.

They knew how to do themselves proud in the 'thirties and 'forties when they wanted a spectacular show. A bill of 1836 inviting Londoners to attend the great pageant of 'Harlequin Guy Fawkes' promises an aerial ship, Lambeth Palace, the House of Lords vaults, the Great Dome of St. Paul's by moonlight, and Sir Francis Moore's Abode. It would be hard to beat that record even to-day. We are on fairly familiar terms with aerial ships, but few of us have explored the House of Lords vaults. There are also weapons—double-handed swords—and expensive armour, used, we imagine, in 'Faust'; a gorgeous suit of armour used in 'Othello,' and the helmet of Lohengrin. We smile at De Grieux's sword, which that unhappy chevalier never draws to any real purpose; but we cannot smile at the sword of Scarpia. There are the crowns—of paste, yet beautiful—to be worn in 'The Diamonds of the Crown,' the bracelets of Trebelli, and a lovely girdle for Desdemona. But in leaving the foyer which houses these valuable mementoes our thoughts revert to the first exhibit, the autograph of Balfe:

> 'The light of other days is faded.'

'SEMELE' AT CAMBRIDGE

In last month's issue of the Musical Times appeared a most informative article on Handel's 'Semele' by Mr. Barclay Squire. The parts played by Congreve and by Handel in the production of libretto and score were fully explained. I am therefore absolved from any duty of historical explanation. It rests with me merely to give a personal impression of the music and of its performance in opera form.

Cambridge is to be warmly congratulated. It was a bold thing to revive this work, and the boldness has been justified. As an opera 'Semele' gives opportunity for the spectacular, and advantage was taken of this in the planning of a number of stage pictures which by their grouping and colour were very pleasant to the eye. It gives less opportunity for dramatic expression. It is to be doubted whether any of Handel's operas could be given with the life and movement which go to the making of 'drama,' and 'Semele' was not originally an opera, but a secular oratorio—if this contradiction in terms is to be permitted. However, if we think Wagner's Wotan speeches dramatic there is no reason why we should not also think Handel's da capo arias dramatic, and when these are reduced in length, as was done at Cambridge, by decapitating the da capo, progress to the next thing is not so long delayed as to become painful. Considering that the cast was, with two exceptions, a purely local one, the singing of the arias and of the expressive recitatives that abound in the work was very creditable. The choruses are solid Handelian things, substantial and satisfying, and, indeed, quite on the best Handelian oratorio level. They had, of course, to be sung from memory, and under the conditions of the opera stage and not of the formally arranged choral society with every member facing the conductor.

The difficulties thus imposed were admirably surmounted. The choral force swung along surely and rhythmically, and the tone was excellent—though a trifle out of balance, inasmuch as in a forte the women's voices were more powerful than those of the men.

The orchestral playing at the opening of the Overture sounded a little unsteady. Then it settled down, and the defect disappeared. Indeed, in some passages the playing was almost brilliant; and, once again let one say, Cambridge did it—with the help of one imported oboe-player.

Altogether, then, this was an excellent amateur production, and, as an amateur production, to be highly commended. And as an amateur production it abounded in the quality that amateur in its older and truer sense represents—love for the work that was being done.

The opera was produced by Mr. Dennis Arundell, who also designed the scenery. The music was prepared and conducted by Dr. Cyril Rootham. The secretarial organization and administration were carried out by Mr. J. F. Shepherdson. A host of important helpers must be passed over, lest this notice become too much like a slice from the Cambridge directory, and the vocal principals given as follows:

Priest of Juno	Norman Roff
Semele	*Bertha Steventon
Athamas	Christopher Maysor
Ino	Camille Prior / Winifred Roberts
Cadmus	Alan Richards
Juno	Mildred Freeman
Iris	Dorothy Page
Jupiter	*John Dean
Somnus	Anthony Richards
Apollo	Myer Salaman

The two asterisks indicate the two borrowed vocalists. Included in the cast should be two Borzoi dogs and a fantail pigeon, which on the first night behaved admirably, and two goats that appeared to require a little more stage experience. Juno's 'chariot drawn by peacocks' was not seen; she doubtless left it behind the scenes, as her Wagnerian counterpart Fricka is nowadays sometimes also wise enough to do with her 'car drawn by two harnessed rams.' We didn't see 'Iris on a rainbow,' but we had some very good thunder.

P. A. S.

'PEER GYNT' AT OXFORD

The performance of 'Peer Gynt,' given by the Oxford University Dramatic Society from February 10 to 14, had an especial musical interest, in that Grieg's incidental music was performed then almost in its entirety. Hitherto, we in this country have had little opportunity of becoming acquainted with anything more than the Suite, which is but a moiety of the whole. The score consists of twenty-three numbers, and of these nineteen were played in the Oxford production. Grieg began this work in 1873, and finished the scoring in 1875. The idea of composing incidental music was Ibsen's own suggestion, and he drew up various schemes for the composer's guidance, which, however, were not strictly followed. But Grieg adopted Ibsen's ideas of treating some of the dialogue melodramatically (as recitations to music), and of composing a special dance melody for the wedding scene. Grieg himself said, 'My music requires the stage performance to bring out clearly the musical intentions,' and the O.U.D.S. production made manifest that the music is very faithfully allied to the various scenes and incidents of the play, and that in no way can it be regarded merely objectively. Nothing but gratitude can be given to Dr. W. H. Harris (New College) for the meticulous care with which he prepared the musical side of the play. The orchestral parts (those containing the author's and composer's marginal notes) had been brought from Germany, and an orchestra of about thirty-five members had been organized for the occasion. Great difficulty was found in the housing of these players in the New Theatre, and in the end two rows of stalls were sacrificed for the purpose. Then followed the difficulty of acoustics; many experiments were tried before the final arrangement was decided upon, and even so, on the first night I found the timpani rather oppressive, and in the 'Dovrë-Trolls' scene utterly tyrannical. When Mr. Westrup was resting, however, it was possible to judge the orchestral playing as more than ordinarily fine. Dr. Harris gave clear injunctions at every point, and the result was greatly removed from the careless playing of incidental music which is tolerated and encouraged in most of our theatres. As for the quality of the music, Grieg was very right in judging a stage performance as necessary, not only 'to bring out the musical intentions' but also at times to cover the musical failings. It is easy to understand why the Suite has been taken to the public heart, and the rest left. The public, or rather the Public Purveyor, is right again.

The numbers forming the Suite are by far the most inherently musical; the rest of them are full of grand gesture and loud protestation (as indeed befits Ibsen's cumbrous and twisted conception), and soon we tire of the striving after effect just as we tire of that hardy annual at the Promenades—the Pianoforte Concerto, for all its happy invention. The scoring is very uneven—delicate and apt at one time, and at another too obviously underlined.

But there is this to be said for Grieg's music. Its entrance often gives most welcome relief to the heavy progress of the play. There are good reasons for the fact that 'Peer Gynt' has hitherto been presented only twice in England, reasons altogether apart from the difficulties of staging. The 'Theatre of Ideas' has never taken root in this country; and even if it had, I doubt very much whether this unconcentrated compound of a play would have found favour; it is not that we are an unimaginative people in the theatre, but that we are 'too full of the milk of human kindness.'

Compare Falstaff, with all his shabbiness and sad decline, with Peer, and which is the more truly heroical as an imaginative flight? You will find the answer in another question: 'Which is the more human?'

But Mr. Reginald Denham disagrees with this view, Indeed it was necessary for him to believe in Ibsen's play in order to produce it as he did. The 'production' was, in itself apart, a genuine work of art, full of inspired thought. The problems of 'cutting' were manifold and frightening. Mr. Denham's surgery, however, was carried through with an unfaltering hand, implying experience far beyond his years. Most admirable of all were the inclusions. For instance, most producers would have omitted the Churchyard Scene. Its retention on this occasion not only brought about a point of repose, but also the most beautiful speaking in the whole play from Mr. A. Tandy (Magdalen) as the Pastor.

The Peer Gynt was Mr. R. W. Speaight (Lincoln), a very young actor, who has already played a number of big Shakespearean parts with great success. He is extremely well versed in all the 'methods' of voice and gesture, but he failed to convince me that the iron had entered into his soul. There is a pianist—perhaps you will be able to fit this cap—who plays the 'Appassionata' in the self-same way. But he is older than Mr. Speaight, and will never learn better ways. Mr. Speaight will learn, I am convinced, for he has already profited by experience. His performance was, incidentally, a faultless feat of memory. There remains but to commend with warmth the décor of Mr. Alexander Penrose. His designs stood for beauty and simplicity—of one mind in their house. BASIL MAINE.

THE EDUCATIONAL USE OF THE PLAYER-PIANO

On February 3, at the Royal Academy of Music, the first meeting was held of a new musical body—the Honorary Advisory Committee on the Educational Use of Player-Piano Rolls—of which the present members are as follows: Sir Alexander Mackenzie (chairman), Sir Hugh Allen, Director of the Royal College of Music, Sir Landon Ronald, Principal of the Guildhall School of Music, Mr. J. B. McEwen, Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, Sir Henry Wood, Prof. C. H. Kitson, Mr. Robin H. Legge, and Mr. Percy A. Scholes, the last named agreeing to serve as honorary secretary.

The members of the committee feel that up to the present educationists have not made full use of the facilities that exist for training the pupils of schools and the adult students of colleges in the knowledge and appreciation of music by means of the use of the player-piano, including recently recorded rolls by great artists. In this direction they hope to exercise a stimulating influence. It will be recalled that the Senate of the University of London recently decided that the University library should be extended by a liberal provision of scores, gramophone records, and pianola rolls, as a method of enabling members of the University to become acquainted with classical and modern musical works in the easiest way, and this decision, though it has no direct connection with the formation of the present committee, points to the existence of a need which it is hoped will now be met.

ORLANDO GIBBONS

The members of the Musical Association met at the Royal College of Music on January 13, to hear a paper from the Rev. Dr. Edmund H. Fellowes on 'Orlando Gibbons,' the Tercentenary of whose death, in 1625, occurs this year. The lecturer said that Mr. Gustav Holst, lecturing on 'Byrd and Weelkes' just two years ago, remarked that the British public was so slow in recognising the work of its own musicians, that such commemorations served a good purpose, and the truth of that remark had been proved since. Before 1923 Byrd's name meant nothing to the vast majority of English-speaking people, and even in musical circles the extent and quality of his music were little known. Then came the Tercentenary celebrations, and his name was no longer unfamiliar to his fellow countrymen at large. It might perhaps be urged that there was no need for a similar advertisement of Gibbons, whose name was familiar already; but on the other hand his music was far from being as familiar as it ought to be.

Orlando Gibbons was the youngest child of William and Mary Gibbons, and was born at Cambridge in 1583, the exact date being unknown. William Gibbons was one of the City Waits, and a musician of some standing. Though born at Cambridge, Orlando was baptized at Oxford. It was not known what took his parents temporarily to that city with their infant. At the age of twelve, Orlando became a chorister of King's College, Cambridge, where his eldest brother Edward was a lay-clerk. He left the choir in 1598, and matriculated in the University as a 'sizar from King's.' At the age of twenty-one he became one of the organists at the Chapel Royal, and held the appointment until his death. It was not until he had served nearly twenty years at the Chapel Royal that Gibbons was appointed organist at Westminster Abbey, holding the two posts together.

The general circumstances of Gibbons's death were well known, but the details had been told with no little inaccuracy. In the first place the marriage of Charles I. did not, and never was intended, to take place at Canterbury. In fact it took place at Notre Dame, Paris, on May 1, 1625, when in the King's absence the Duke of Buckingham acted as his proxy. When the Queen came to England, Charles arranged to go to Canterbury, there to await her arrival at Dover. As she was to be attended by a large and splendid retinue, it was important that Charles should have with him all the appurtenances of Royal majesty. Not the least of these was the Chapel Royal, a term that had never correctly denoted the bricks and mortar, but the whole personnel, together with all the plate, vestments, books, &c., belonging to the establishment. For centuries it was the custom of the Sovereign to take with him the Chapel Royal in this sense, when he travelled in state, so on this occasion not Gibbons alone, but the whole of the Chapel was summoned to Canterbury to attend on the King. There was not a vestige of evidence to show that Gibbons was commissioned to write any special music.

During the period of waiting for the Queen's arrival, which for several causes had been delayed, Gibbons was seized with an apoplectic fit, and died suddenly on June 5. In those days when sudden death was so commonly associated with the dreaded black death, grave alarm was created by this occurrence, and the Court doctors were summoned to make a post mortem examination. They found all the symptoms of apoplexy, and reported accordingly. Hawkins and many others had stated quite incorrectly that small-pox was the cause of Gibbons's death. The body was buried in Canterbury Cathedral on June 6, and a monumental tablet was shortly afterwards placed in the north wall of the nave. The inscription was surmounted by a bust of the composer and his coat of arms. The Latin inscription had rarely been correctly printed; lamentable errors were to be found in Dart's 'History of Canterbury,' Hawkins's 'History of Music,' and in several more modern books. The concluding words of the inscription involved a characteristic pun which was entirely destroyed, apart from the nonsense made of the sentence, by reading moerentissimo moerentissima for merentissimo moerentissima.

Passing to Gibbons's music, it must be observed that he wrote nothing for the Latin rites of the Church so far as is known, which considering the times is not strange. His Church music divided itself into two distinct styles. On the one hand he looked back to the 16th century and wrote in the classic manner of the great polyphonists; on the other, he looked forward and aimed at developing the 'verse' anthem with passages for solo voice accompanied either by the organ or by stringed instruments. Judging by numbers, Gibbons seems to have preferred the 'verse' anthem, for out of forty works known to us to-day no fewer than twenty-five were of that type, against fifteen of the older kind. It must be confessed, however, that his 'verse' anthems were with few exceptions on a much lower level than his purely polyphonic music. Yet due credit must be liberally extended to Gibbons, who, in the true spirit of the Elizabethans, preferred to explore new methods and new designs even if first-rate success was not to be secured in so doing.

As a madrigal writer, Gibbons necessarily followed the polyphonic style, and here, as in his unaccompanied anthems, he proved himself to be one of the outstanding figures in that great group of composers. Most of his madrigals were exceedingly difficult to sing with telling effect, partly because of the severity of their subjects, and partly because of the intricacy of the part-writing, which was of an unusually independent character, woven together with strands of greater length than was the case with most of the other polyphonists. For this reason, in Gibbons's work it was a matter of especial difficulty to decide which voice was to be prominent here and which there, and how each was to contribute in turn to the general effect. These were important details in almost all madrigals, but Gibbons's more than any other were rendered ineffective, and failed to please, if each part strove for equality of importance, if not for pre-eminence, throughout the composition. And the temptation to err on these lines was not minimised by the fact that the melodic material of each voice-part was, as a rule, so consistently interesting and beautiful.

As a performer, Gibbons held an unrivalled position, and the fact that Byrd and Bull, both many years his senior, invited him to unite with them in the production of 'Parthenia,' showed in what high esteem they held him. He contributed six pieces to that collection. More than thirty more of his compositions for the Virginalls were to be found in various important collections of the period, notably in Benjamin Cosyn's book, and in the Drexel Collection. It was curious that the compiler of the FitzWilliam Virginal Book should have almost completely excluded Gibbons from that very large collection. No more than three of his pieces were included, and of these one was without the composer's name, and one was attributed to another composer.

Of chamber music Gibbons had left a larger store than most of his contemporaries. The string music of this period was much misunderstood. It was often regarded as church-like and dull, but if the Quartets of Beethoven and Mozart were set out in notes of twice the length and without any bowing, they would look unlike string music, and modern players would have great difficulty in quickly grasping the shape of the phrases. Conversely, if the notation of the Tudor string music was presented in modern terms on the basis of the crotchet unit, not only did it immediately become alive, but it was apparent that these composers evolved a definite string technique of their own. The freedom of rhythmic treatment which now at last was being generally recognised, was often also a notable feature of their chamber music. If rhythms were ignored or wrongly phrased, it could not cause surprise if the music sounded dull. The same principle applied to all this music, and Gibbons was no exception. The lecturer's performance of various passages amply demonstrated his contention.

The lecture derived much interest from the illustrations, which included 'This is the Record of John' (accompanied by a quintet of strings), 'Lord, in Thy wrath rebuke me not,' and 'Fair is the rose,' all sung by a body of singers from Morley College, and concluded with the Fantasia No. 2, for string quartet, led by Dr. Fellowes.

'ISOLATED CONTINUITY' IN ORGAN MUSIC

By C. F. Waters

The student of musical history will be able to divide instrumental music generally into certain well-defined periods. It is impossible in art to determine exactly where one 'school' begins and another ends; one phase merges into another, and in the climax of one style may be found the seed of a new. Yet instrumental music can be regarded as comprising three main divisions,

> '. . . each marked [says Parry] by consistent distinguishing traits; the first by contrapuntal methods akin to those of choral music; the second by the development of pure harmonic forms of the sonata order, which are shown in their highest perfection in the Sonatas and Symphonies of Beethoven; and the third by a striving after greater freedom than the pure sonata forms seem to allow, or an extension of its scheme by intellectual devices, and new kinds of contrapuntal methods; and by more decisive adoption than formerly of ideas and programmes as the basis of art.'

Music for the organ, however, seems to be in a class apart, for there is a continuity not to be found in instrumental music generally. It seems to hold an isolated position, and to be hardly susceptible at all to outside influences. Its history shows an unwillingness to depart from primitive forms—a quality which, for want of a better term, might be described as 'isolated continuity.'

With the close association of organs with the church service it was not unnatural to find choral methods being adopted and features in the service affording inspiration. The extempore variations on the Lutheran Chorales were committed to paper and became crystallised in a definite form of composition, the chorale prelude. The 'theme with variations' is common enough in instrumental music of all generations, but the variety of designs to be found in the chorale prelude and the general character of the form have no parallel in the music for other instruments. With slow-moving pedals interest and vitality had perforce to be maintained by more animated work in the manual parts. Thus, one of the primitive designs consisted of a plain statement of the chorale with embellishments in the manual parts at the end of each line of the melody, while in another early type the melody was assigned in long notes to the pedals accompanied by more animated movement in the manuals. The stately nature of the chorale is obviously suited to the organ and it is significant that in turning attention to the instrument more than one great master of choral and instrumental composition has chosen to adopt the chorale prelude as a medium of expression. Do we not recall the exquisite examples in this form by Brahms and Parry, not to mention those written by living composers?

Equally suited to the instrument is the ground-bass, the pedals treading out the oft-repeated theme with a superstructure for the manuals of varied texture. Here again, we find the continued use of a form which since Purcell has had practically no place in instrumental music outside. This form—which in Stanford's opinion is 'more difficult to handle' than the normal variation form—had been mastered by that 'high-spirited group of composers,' Bach's predecessors. Although overshadowed by the works of the great master, the compositions of this early school are of more than historical interest, and none reveal better workmanship than the Passacaglias and Chaconnes. These early essays in the ground-bass form have been followed up by Bach in his gigantic Passacaglia in C minor, Rheinberger in the Finale of his E minor Sonata, Max Reger in his D minor Passacaglia, and by Karg-Elert in his 'Chaconne and Fugue Trilogy with Choral.' This line of works in the ground-bass form, like the parallel line of Chorale Preludes, is without a counterpart in any other branch of the art.

Another of the primitive forms, the Toccata, cannot claim such a continuous line of examples, but it is not less isolated than the Chorale Prelude or the Chaconne and Passacaglia, for while there is some analogy between the Toccata and the Fantasia, there is nothing to correspond exactly to the stupendous Toccatas of Bach. In its primitive state it illustrates the struggle between tradition and adventure—the adherence to choral methods and the desire to introduce new life and interest. Thus the earliest examples comprised series of chords varied by rapid scale-passages and divers embellishments. Of this form Parry says:

> '. . . though crude and elementary, it has considerable historical importance as one of the first of the large musical forms which established a sort of individuality as an instrumental composition independent of choral models.'

Since Bach there has been no clear line of continuity as regards the Toccata. Those movements to which the name has been more recently applied are not characterised by the same freedom in design and dramatic contrasts, and the title seems to have become but little more than a substitute for moto continuo or moto perpetuo.

The gulf between organ music and other branches of instrumental music is bridged at one important point—the Fugue, although the frequency with which the fugal form has been utilised in organ music is unique. Reference will be made to this later, in connection with the organ sonata. There are differences to be found in the fugues for various instruments or combinations of instruments which are explained by the differences in the instruments themselves. The subject ideally suited to strings might prove ineffective or difficult for the organ, and within the limits of the two hands on the harpsichord subjects of wide range which could be adequately dealt with by strings would be a physical impossibility. In comparing the organ fugues with the '48' it will be seen that the character of the latter accords with the quieter nature of the clavichord, whose gentle tones were much beloved of the great master. Some of the organ fugues are of much more extensive and elaborate design, and reveal the influence of the Toccata.

A further point of contact should be noted. In Bach's Trio-Sonatas we may see a counterpart to the harpsichord dance suites, not only in their nature as a collection of separate, self-contained movements, but also in the 'short binary' form of the respective movements. Beautiful though these Trio-Sonatas are, they represent a tiny proportion of the composer's work for the organ, and there appear to be no precedents in the work of his predecessors in organ composition either as regards the construction of individual movements or the collection as a whole. Hardly any of the six sections of Muffat's 'Toccata Sexta' could be regarded as self-contained movements, and in none of the sections is there any approach to binary form, while Buxtehude's Prelude and Fugue in F sharp minor has the characteristics of the Toccata. Bach uses the 'short binary' form in some of his Organ Preludes—e.g., the F minor—but more often breaks off into freer methods akin to the Toccata. Two of the longer examples, the E flat and one of the C minor Preludes, are cast in the harmonic mould of Haydn and Mozart, and moreover contain other features of interest in anticipation of the sonata form. In this respect it is interesting to observe, in passing, that there should be such foreshadowings of sonata form when there is no counterpart in organ music to the Symphonies and Sonatas of Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven.

Mendelssohn in his organ works was certainly confronted with a difficulty in having no precedents later than Bach, and in his Preludes and Fugues he frankly admits his indebtedness to his illustrious predecessor. In his six Organ Sonatas Bach's influence is also apparent. In none is there any approach to sonata form; in four, use is made of chorales, the sixth comprising a set of variations and a fugue on the chorale 'Vater unser'; and in three other Sonatas fugues or fugal movements appear. With the complete absence of any corresponding works to the sonatas of the Haydn-Mozart-Beethoven period, and the reversion to the methods of Bach, the isolated character of organ music is emphasised and continuity is maintained unbroken.

The subsequent history of the organ sonata reveals the use of 'sonata form,' which, after all, contains no qualities rendering it unsuitable to the instrument, and a number of Rheinberger first movements can be found which adhere more or less closely to the Beethoven design. Yet there seems an unwillingness to forsake early habits, and the Sonatas of Rheinberger and other composers abound in fugal writing. Frequently the final movement takes the form of an introduction and a regularly worked-out fugue. Of greater interest is the fusion of fugue and sonata form to be found in such Sonatas as Rheinberger's E minor and C major, in the first movements of which a fugal section takes the rôle of the first subject, with a contrasted motive as second subject. A further point of interest, illustrative of both 'isolation' and 'continuity,' lies in the use of the Passacaglia as the Finale of the E minor Sonata. Nor is the Chorale forsaken in the variety of basic forms used in organ sonatas. Harwoood's C sharp minor Sonata, for example, displays an effective combination of sonata form in the first movement, with allusions to the Chorale in the development section, a short middle movement, and an Introduction and Fugue as the Finale, the Chorale being interwoven in the fugue, and finally appearing undisguised in a bold statement at the conclusion of the work.

Turning to the last tendency of instrumental music referred to in Parry's definition, we find organ music almost entirely unaffected by the trend towards the 'more decisive adoption than formerly of ideas and programmes as the basis of art.' True, individual examples of 'programme-music' can be quoted, but so can such be traced in the instrumental music of the first and second phases within Parry's definition. We can only reach the conclusion that there has been no trend towards realism in modern organ music. Rather would it seem that, forsaking a type of organ composition, much in vogue for a time until recently, which relied mainly on registration effects and not on intrinsic merit, composers for the instrument at the present time are breathing new life into the basic organ forms, giving us works which are not dependent upon elaborate specifications but stand the test on whatever instrument they may be played. We may vary the title Chorale Prelude to Choral Improvisations or Choral Fantasy—Stanford was quite content with the time-honoured label Prelude and Fugue. The underlying idea however remains the same, and with its faithfulness to the best traditions of organ composition in rejuvenating the primitive and well-tested designs, we cannot but feel that organ music of to-day is progressing along the right road. It is in this 'isolated continuity' that organ music will justify itself.

London Concerts

HAMILTON HARTY'S 'IRISH' SYMPHONY

A special concert was given by the Royal Albert Hall Orchestra at Queen's Hall, on January 21, and Mr. Hamilton Harty's 'Irish' Symphony was played for the first time in London, under the composer's direction. It had previously been given at Manchester and Belfast.

The 'Irish' Symphony re-opens an old problem, and leaves it as far from solution as before. Can symphonic music be made out of folk-tunes? The answer that Dvorák succeeded is incomplete. His tunes happened to be ideal ones—good, bold bits of melody that lent themselves to 'snatchy' treatment; Dvorák set about his work with inspired skill, and his 'New World' Symphony stands alone. The trouble with folk-tunes is that they insist on statement rather than reference. The composer finds he is 'arranging them for orchestra' and weaving a rhapsody round them. While he is pulled one way by his tunes he is pulled another way by his symphonising, and his yielding first one way then the other gives an indeterminate style to his writing. That Mr. Harty has not kept entirely free of this fault from beginning to end is the most that can be said against his 'Irish' Symphony, a work of great significance and beauty.

Each movement defines a picture left in the composer's memory by his early life in Ireland. The first, 'On the Shores of Lough Neagh,' has in it not only the landscape, but the strange stories that had it for background. It is a Fantasia on a very definite mood. The second, 'Fair-day in the streets of a town,' is a vivacious Scherzo, into which a well-known tune leaps gaily. The tune appears to have two names in Ireland, but in England it is 'The girl I left behind me.' The movement is humorous, clever, and as spontaneous as a Mozart allegro. Commentators—to whom the writer adds himself—have urged that this movement be 'lifted' from the Symphony to live its own life. The third might well accompany it as a preceding Adagio. This movement, 'In the Antrim Hills,' has a wake for a setting, and a fine tune for its music. It is here that Mr. Harty throws off a certain aloofness that can be detected in his approaches to the emotional, and the warmth he permits himself in the working out of his slow movement may be said to mark the climax of the Symphony. The Finale is called 'The twelfth of July,' and its principal tune is 'The Boyne Water.' Its spirited progress is interrupted by the lament from the third movement—'In the midst of the uproar there was a sudden silence, and we saw a simple group carrying a coffin down the steep street on the way to the Catholic burying-place.' The episode is finely drawn—the sudden awe, and the impatient fragments of the fighting-song waiting to resume sway over things. As the Symphony comes to its triumphant ending, one feels that a fine subject has been worthily treated, and that his respect for Mr. Harty as a musician has broadened.

Mr. Harty's arrangement of Handel's 'Music for the Royal Fireworks' opened the programme—a really good example of adaptation. M.

ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY

The concert on January 29 gave us the first London performance of Honegger's 'Pacific 231.' There is nothing to be said against a composer writing a piece around a railway engine. Any form of transport lends itself admirably to musical representation, from galloping horses to gondolas. The point is, what does the composer do with his idea? Honegger falls between two stools. His published statement says he seeks 'not to imitate the noises of an engine, but to translate into a musical structure a visual impression and a feeling of physical elation.' A good scheme, but unfortunately the composer does make quite a lot of imitative noises, and does not induce a feeling of physical elation.

Judged by its noises 'Pacific 231' is an engine that would rouse nervousness in the passengers, and increase the rate of accident insurance to a prohibitive point. There is not a suggestion of the clean, rhythmic running that distinguishes the fine locomotive from a collection of old iron; nor is there an impression of speed. 'Pacific 231' never leaves the platform; she stays there, and gives a noisy demonstration of her functional disorders, which appear to be mainly internal. At least one hearer found himself looking round for an oilcan and a spanner. Those of the audience who describe the work as 'good fun' unconsciously condemn it, for Honegger avowedly set out to give us a 'lyrical and pathetic impression' of a fast-moving train. Hence, the more the fun the bigger the failure. The programme included also Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, a Bach Concerto for violin, flute, and pianoforte (Miss Marjorie Hayward, Messrs. A. Fransella and Norman Wilks), Delius's 'Summer Night on the River,' Debussy's 'Iberia,' and 'Also sprach Zarathrusta.' Mr. Eugène Goossens conducted. H. G.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. Furtwängler being detained in America, this concert was entrusted to Sir Thomas Beecham, who substituted a programme of his own selection for that of the prospectus, and made it a Beecham evening in the fullest sense by bringing all his buoyant enthusiasm into play. It seemed almost as if, being engaged as a deputy, he took special delight in being at his best, possibly not entirely without an ironical arrière pensée. His beloved Mozart was represented by the 'Magic Flute' Overture and the Adagio from one of the Divertimenti, both played exquisitely. His reading of the 'Siegfried Idyll' may have been unorthodox in that he resisted all temptation to linger unduly at seductive points, but the music gained thereby in the feeling of motion. Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Antar,' which he has always preferred to the same composer's more popular 'Scheherazade,' was presented as a vividly coloured picture-book. At the end of the programme came Delius's 'Paris,' which had not been heard in London for some time, though regarded by many as the composer's best orchestral work. E. E.

BRITISH WOMEN'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

With all respect to Miss Gwynne Kimpton and her ladies, it cannot be denied that the interest of this concert was concentrated upon Madame Guilhermina Suggia, who was in such splendid form that even the banalties of the Saint-Saëns 'Cello Concerto became temporarily endowed with meaning, and the Bach C major Suite was an apotheosis. Perhaps the news, made public the same evening, of the purchase for the nation of Augustus John's famous portrait may have contributed to the glamour, but it was Suggia alone who made the evening memorable. The orchestra is improving, not perhaps vertiginously, but still improving, and Miss Kimpton appears to be acquiring some of what may be termed the amenities of her art, but between them they did not shed radiance upon Beethoven's seventh Symphony, which was the main feature of the programme. E. E.

THE COPENHAGEN QUARTET

We hope the able members of the Copenhagen Quartet are born pioneers, and were not induced to include in their programme the works of Stravinsky and Sibelius simply in order to be up-to-date. The Stravinsky fashion has already set, and the composer himself is reported as having joined the ranks of the die-hards. On the other hand, the pioneer—the born pioneer who feels bound to wander about to satisfy a longing for adventure—must derive some enjoyment both from the Stravinsky and the Sibelius Quartets. Stravinsky is 'all out,' driving theory to absurdity, utterly careless of what casualties may occur by the way. He resembles in this his countrymen of Moscow who, having accepted a system of government plausible up to a point on paper, refuse utterly to recognise its complete practical failure. These Slav revolutionaries remind us of Voltaire's Candide, who, after having been kicked and robbed, betrayed and beaten, still maintains with his last breath that this is the best of all possible worlds. Incidentally, it may be noted that the Copenhagen players performed the Stravinsky Quartet twice. What is the reason for this mistaken zeal? Surely two lemons taste no sweeter than one—even at Copenhagen. If they thought that the encore would work a change in the fortunes of the day, they were sadly in error. It did not.

The Sibelius Quartet failed to hold our interest for the simple reason that quartet writing is, apparently, not the composer's 'forte.' He seems uncertain whether to give vent to his native wood-note wild or to model his work on the classical pattern. Thus he goes meandering along, sometimes through pleasant and novel scenery, sometimes through a landscape which is not quite dreary enough to affect us as potently as vast, barren spaces do. That the Quartet is the work of a good musician is evident and undeniable. But Sibelius is much more than that, and this Quartet does not do justice in the least to his real powers—the power of suggesting something dark and sinister like the enchanted woods ancient heroes dreamed of, or the rugged strength of, say, his 'Finlandia.' B. V.

THE LÉNER QUARTET

The Quartet from its early days to Beethoven—such was the scheme developed by the Hungarian Quartet led by M. Léner in a short series of concerts. It sounds delightful, yet, like most things in this world of ours, it proved just a little less interesting than we expected. Truth to tell, the choice of composers was not quite so happy as it might have been. On the first evening, for instance, not a single work was played which justified selection on other than purely historical grounds. But if we are to go back to the sources of quartet music something should also be said for the Elizabethan and Tudor composers. The second evening was devoted to Haydn and Boccherini. We were on fairly safe ground here, for, of course, it is impossible to find a Quartet of Haydn's which is not supremely interesting in one movement or another. The choice of Boccherini's Quintet was good, but also obvious. One looks to such organizations as the Léner Quartet for enterprise. Having conquered all there is to be conquered, it has the time—which less admirable organizations have not—to search for something that has been overlooked or unjustly neglected. It seems incredible that of the huge quantity of chamber music Boccherini left us, the Quintet is the one and only thing worth remembering. The Mozart concert was a sheer delight—as would be expected, for we have had other opportunities before to realise that Mozart appeals to M. Léner and his colleagues in a very special degree. B. V.

CONTEMPORARY MUSIC CENTRE

Beginning and concluding with a pair of Violin Sonatas by English composers, this programme proved less subversive and more enjoyable than some of its recent predecessors. It is right that we should enlarge our acquaintance with contemporary effort, but it is none the less agreeable to turn to those of its protagonists who meet us half-way, like E. J. Moeran, or three-quarters of the way, like Herbert Howells. Both Sonatas were convincingly played by Miss Winifred Small and Mr. Gordon Bryan, and each is in its own genre—one robust and occasionally almost bluntly frank, the other suave and poetic—a valuable contribution to our growing treasury of chamber music.

Mr. Bryan played a copious selection of pianoforte pieces by the Dutch composer, Alex Voormolen, and some attractive children's pieces proved excellent entertainment.

Miss Joan Elwes had a strange task set her in Pizzetti's 'Angelica,' a Neapolitan ballad intended for a male voice which, to convey the sense of the poem, should have a tinge of intoxication. In the circumstances it was a feat to convey as much as she did of the impact of tragedy; but she was better served in Rubbra's 'A Hymn to the Virgin,' and a pair of fantastic songs by Gordon Bryan. E. E.

PADEREWSKI

The Albert Hall was crowded on February 18, when Paderewski gave his recital, one of a series of five (Cardiff, Liverpool, London, Manchester, and Glasgow) in aid of the British Legion—a truly noble gift. A programme that made no concessions—the Bach-Liszt Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, some Haydn, Mozart, a Beethoven Sonata (D minor, Op. 31, No. 2), the Schubert-Liszt 'Hark! hark!' and 'The Erl-King,' a Chopin group, and the 'Don Juan' Fantasia—and some magnificent playing (save in the Bach, which was rough and not always clear), made the occasion memorable. H. G.

DAME ETHEL SMYTH'S MASS IN D

The history of this Mass is quickly stated. It was written after the composer's return from Germany in 1889. The Royal Choral Society performed it in 1893, under Barnby. The Benedictus was sung by the Crystal Palace Choir at the composer's Queen's Hall concert in April, 1911. The Birmingham Festival Choral Society sang the Mass under Mr. Adrian C. Boult, at Birmingham, on February 7 last year, and again at Queen's Hall, London, on March 8. On January 31 this year the Royal Choral Society again gave it at the Albert Hall, Dr. Malcolm Sargent conducting. We wonder whether any Albert Hall singer took part in both performances. Mr. Ben Davies was the tenor of 1893, and he is still singing. This time we had Miss Caroline Hatchard, Miss Astra Desmond, Mr. Archibald Winter, and Mr. Herbert Heyner. The individual success of the afternoon was Dr. Malcolm Sargent, whose special gifts for choral conducting were of immense service to the choir and to the composer.

The merits of the Mass have been fully described in these columns. What ought to appeal more particularly to the choral world of to-day is its practicability. The re-discovery of the Mass is opportune, for choral societies are anxious to discover a work that is new to them and easy to assimilate. It is as much based on tonic-and-dominant harmony as Beethoven's, its choral writing is broad and simple, and the sole difficulty it presents is the physical one of sustaining a climax. This was the only difficulty hinted at in the Royal Choral Society's performance, which gave to the Mass all that it wanted of sonority and dramatic force.

Elgar's 'Spirit of England,' following the Mass, made up an afternoon of 'solemn musick' in which the 'Enigma Variations' formed a happy interlude. X.

CIVIL SERVICE CHOIR

The Civil Service Choir, too new an organization to be able to give to its audience all the perfection of some of the older choral bodies, made up by the generosity of its quantities at its concert at Kingsway Hall on February 11, which Mr. Rutland Boughton conducted. After a performance of Elgar's Pianoforte Quintet by Mr. Charles Woodhouse's party, it was a quarter to eleven, and the writer had to leave; but the fortunate whose time was their own were still left to enjoy choral works of Walford Davies and Rutland Boughton, the new song-cycle of E. J. Moeran, and other good things.

Madrigals were the chief choral business of the concert. A pretty choice had been made of many masterpieces, and the way in which they were sung proved the pleasure the singers had in performing. Such pleasure, rather than that of mere listeners, was no doubt what the madrigalists of old had in mind. How much of the finest music there is which is meant for the player's fun, and how easy it is—when the composer seeks instead to interest and impress the crowd of listeners and indolent reviewers—to become gross and pretentious!

This is not to argue that madrigals are not delicious often to listen to, but to justify the choir which may not have got beyond the point of amusing itself. At that point it has achieved much. Pity the poor who cannot amuse themselves with music—who have to go to concerts, opera, gramophone, or wireless if they want any music—those who have lips but don't sing (even for the most secluded self-amusement), or have fingers but don't play!

Kindly Providence has ordained that men and women in a body can have very good fun in singing, although taken individually there may not be a singer among them. Mr. Boughton's little choir was, however, not a big enough body. When numbers are so reduced the individual singing needs a little more technical cunning, if the result is to pass muster. These singers should seek by private study to improve their tone, if only as a kindness to their zealous and excellent conductor. Meanwhile their spirit is just what is wanted. C.

SOME SINGERS OF THE MONTH

Mr. John Coates sang on February 10 at Æolian Hall. His programme ranged far, and we did not regret it. Certainly Mr. Coates has done a handsome service in devoting so many of his concerts exclusively to the younger Englishmen, but it was as well to remind us that his art has a universal range. This time he started with the Elizabethans, and gave his second group to the English 17th and 18th centuries. The third was mixed—French, Russian, and German, with 'The Erl-King,' sung with tremendous imaginative force. The last group was modern English—Elgar, Whittaker, Ivor Atkins, D. C. Thomson, and Thomas F. Dunhill. I suppose there can be no doubt at all that John Coates is our finest singer. His art contains everything that a cultivated listener desires from a singer, and lacks perhaps only that aggression of sheer physical strength which carries the vulgar away. What of course so charms us is the unfailing liveliness of the artist's imagination (to which a perfect technique is the servant). No song is perfunctorily sung. Nothing is ever taken for granted. He makes the impression of picking up everything with a fresh curiosity each time. Images form before his eyes, one would say. Beside this singing, average decent singing sounds like a mere exercise.

It was a misfortune that Miss Dorothy Silk was singing on the same evening (Wigmore Hall). I can record only that she was assisted by the English Singers, the Birmingham String Quartet, Dr. Harold Darke, and Mr. A. E. Wilson (bassoon, for a Bach Cantata, No. 155). The programme had so alluring a look, that no one but John Coates could have prevailed against it. It was a programme of madrigals and Purcell, and of Schütz, Tunder, Handel, and Bach.

Madame Elena Gerhardt sang at Queen's Hall on February 3. The programme contained eight numbers from Schubert's wonderful 'Swan Song,' and before and after them Brahms. Mr. Harold Craxton collaborated with most beautiful sympathy and musical spirit. The hall was full, and the audience was clearly enjoying a treat. Madame Gerhardt has a special public, and one that other singers may well envy her. This audience goes not to see the singer, but to hear a certain sort of music (German romantic songs) sung in a way which it is firmly convinced is the most appropriate and admirable. Madame Gerhardt now may do anything she likes in London. She has her devotees. Some things she does are nevertheless open to the cavilling of a detached critic. Two of the most applauded songs were Schubert's 'Fisher Maiden' and his 'Serenade.' Some thousands of hands clapped vigorously, without it occurring to their owners that there was anything inappropriate in a woman singing those songs. It seemed to me—it still seems to me, in spite of the overwhelming Gerhardtian majority—ridiculous to hear a woman serenading her lover, urging him lyrically to come down and join her by moonlight in the shrubbery ('In den stillen Hain hernieder'). But Madame Gerhardt fills a want. The great corpus of German song (Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, and Wolf, with their satellites) is sentimental with a lusciousness unknown to other music, its very smiles being sentimental. There are a great number of tender hearts waiting to drink this in, and Madame Gerhardt serves it to them with unction.

The tender-hearted attach overwhelming importance to the heart—with them the head is nowhere. A rejected heart commits suicide or dies of consumption unless it is dead to all the decencies. On the other hand, a requited heart scorns to make a secret of its satisfaction—'I am in love, I am rushing off to church to get married,' it cries. Madame Gerhardt is equally sympathetic towards the peasant maidens who are so lucky as to be getting married and towards the others who can do nothing but expire pathetically. Do I confess myself singular and heartless if I admit that after about an hour of Gerhardtian heart-iness I always feel it becoming luscious to excess? The music I know to be the music of some of the divinest masters, but the ideals expressed seem to be those of a 'Heartsease' novelette. It would be a comfort to know that there are others who are inclined with me to rebel at this worship of the heart's impulsiveness, and after an hour of Gerhardt's lieder to respect all the more the 18th century, which did not attach such weight to the sensations of the amatory. After all there is something maladive about a heart grown beyond a certain size.

Madame Gerhardt puts her faith unreservedly in the 19th century. She does it with a sincerity which is not to be mistaken and counts much in the effect of her art. It is solid, it is monumental, this faith. It wins over the doubters, as faith is wont to do, making them say, 'There must be more in it than there looks to me to be.'

She has an art—her faith has given her that. The odd thing is that so many who profess to be, not fellow fanatics, but critics, assure us that her art, whose faults we might have been asked to pardon on the ground of her sincerity, is faultless. Well, one must be a prophet inspired, indeed, if it passes unperceived that one drops one's 'h's.'

Madame Gerhardt's breathing is rather equivalent to that grammatical misdemeanour. She advertises persistently the whole process, and if you fail to notice the effort of her inhalation it can be only by the regularity of it, much as one becomes oblivious to a ticking clock. But her whole technique, so far from being finished, is exceedingly rough. Over and over again it was noticed how her tone thinned in descending phrases. The high note of the penultimate phrase in Brahms's 'Immer leiser' was beautifully taken, but the succeeding notes in the phrase were spineless, and so the effect of the climax was largely lost. It may be doubted if she sang a real pianissimo all the evening. I must mention two indubitable successes—'Farewell' and 'The Town,' from the 'Swan Song.'

Mr. Mark Raphael sang the whole of Schubert's 'Maid of the Mill' at his recital at Wigmore Hall, and with Mr. George Reeves as his pianist, most admirably collaborating, he gave us an hour-and-a-half of really pleasant singing. How sweet and winning this music is! Mr. Raphael sang it with a good, sustained style. He knew the music. He has a pleasant, suave tone. We liked his eager earnestness. He gave us the sense of the music. On the other hand his physical resources are small, so that we felt we were getting Schubert on a dwarf scale. The biggest songs, such as 'The Hated Colour,' were almost beyond him. The lack of reserve force made for monotony. 'Forget-me-nots' and 'Withered Flowers' were indeed beautifully done. But he rather failed to bring to the songs the help of any unexpected flash. His German was clear almost to the point of being 'precious,' but he fell now and then into the fault of importing 'h's,' presumably in the interests of emotion. In effect these took off the fine edge of many a well-launched legato. His upper notes in times of stress were comparatively toneless. But this is only criticism of detail. The general performance was uncommonly agreeable.

On the same night Mr. Norman Stone sang at Æolian Hall, and as I chose to hear Schubert (although Mr. Stone too had made up a programme of very marked musical interest), I must discuss him at another time. Enough was heard to prove Mr. Stone the possessor of much wit if of rather less voice. He is not a 'concert grand' among tenors, but rather a spinet. It was singing that scored by neatness and clear diction, and would be unsuited to music of physical passion. Mr. Stone was assisted by the English Singers, among whom he has taken Mr. Steuart Wilson's place.

Miss Cicely Halford sang at Wigmore Hall with a pretty voice of warm quality. It is true that there was nothing very affecting in her line, and her low notes were negligible. We should have liked her much more if her English singing had equalled her French and German. But in songs of Holbrooke, Hughes, and Harty her expression was so lacking in spontaneity and her emotional range so restricted that duty rather than choice seemed to be inspiring her performance. Her Schubert was worth hearing.

A young soprano who was said to be of Manchester, though she came out as 'Mademoiselle Paikin,' sang at Sunday concerts at the Albert and Queen's Halls. Each time the programme was flagrantly designed in the interests of mere vocal display. Mlle. Paikin has worked hard at the woes of the Gildas and the Lucias. When a singer thus concentrates on 'showing off,' she invites the critic to judge with some sternness. Well, this undoubtedly pretty voice ought to be prettier still. Mlle. Paikin is clever, gifted, and accomplished, but in this sort of music one asks for more perfectly rounded tones, whereas she gave us many upper notes which were shrewish; and now and then her intonation was at fault. Also—while I for my part am no glum Puritan in music, and delight in the decorative effect of florid singing, when it is well done—is there any excuse at all for such stuff as Proch's Variations in the concert-room? Excellent composers like Handel, Bach, Mozart, and Bellini (so charming and misjudged a musician), have written showy music for singers, so why drag mere exercises into public service?

A programme of Negro music was given at Wigmore Hall, on February 13, by Mr. John Payne, bass, and Mr. Laurence Brown, pianoforte (the last named was not above joining in the singing from time to time). Mr. Payne had truly noble bass tones, big and soft, but unfortunately they did not last him throughout his scale—going up he grew nasal and helpless. As for the Plantation Hymns of the programme, we Londoners are rather overdone with them. Their musical interest seems to me infinitesimal. No doubt anthropologists find them invaluable.

Miss Evelyn Scotney's singing has been agreeable to hear at several recent concerts. Her accomplishment is unusual, and it is good news to hear that she has joined the B.N.O.C., who needed a Gilda.

Madame Blanche Marchesi, singing at Æolian Hall, impressed us with the prestige and experienced procedure of a long-famous artist. While her physical powers are no longer equal to producing the tone that once was, Madame Marchesi concentrated on verbal effects, and with such skill and truth that the French songs, at least, were most admirable. What a lesson she could give to the hosts of half-trained singers who have the temerity to stand up in public and attempt Fauré, Duparc, and Debussy!

Miss Esther Coleman sang an extremely enterprising and varied programme of songs at Wigmore Hall. One must pay a hearty tribute to the taste that had made the selection, and the musicianship that had overcome the difficulties of so much jagged modern stuff. Against this must be put the singer's poverty of tone, which detracted heavily from her success. After all, it is the singer's business to make the voice first an attractive musical instrument, before learning to play upon it. If Miss Coleman were to cultivate a richer resonance, she would be truly distinguished among our younger singers. A song-cycle by Fauré, 'L'Horizon Chimérique,' was said to be new to London. H. J. Competition Festival Record

Those who are familiar with the teeming industrial life of the West of Scotland, and with the fertilising work of the Glasgow Musical Festival, will not be surprised to learn that of the thirty or so competition festivals which have come into being in Scotland during the past fifteen years, fully one-half are located within a radius of thirty miles around Glasgow, and half-a-dozen are held within Glasgow itself.

The GLASGOW EASTERN Festival, recently established with the encouragement and financial backing of the parent Glasgow Festival, lasted for three days, and attracted many competitors new to festival work who will doubtless find their way in time into the lists of the parent Festival.

CAMBUSLANG, a residential suburb five miles out of Glasgow, in the coal and iron district, held its fourth annual Festival, which ran for two entire Saturdays, and twelve other evenings. The musical adjudicators were Mr. H. Plunket Greene and Mr. A. M. Henderson. The number of competitors was large, and a good standard of performance was maintained.

CHESTERFIELD.—The second Chesterfield Festival opened on January 29 with an entry list increased from two thousand to two thousand five hundred. A successful children's day was held. Various solos occupied most of the second day. The schools made an excellent show of country dances. Holmewood Ladies' Choir (Mr. L. Lawson) proved a few marks superior to Chesterfield Ladies' Choir (Mr. J. C. Simon). On the third and concluding day Doncaster Choral Union (Mr. S. Ward-Casey) won by a mark from Holmewood Prize Choir (Mr. L. Lawson), the tests being Coleridge-Taylor's 'The Lee Shore' and German's 'O Peaceful Night.' The Duke of Devonshire spoke at the final meeting.

DUMBARTONSHIRE.—The sixth Festival was held at Dumbarton on February 6 and 7. Entries showed a slight falling-off, and there were a good many withdrawals, owing no doubt to the influenza epidemic. The standard of performance in the choral sections was high. The school work was, as usual, extremely good, the principal contests being won by Dumbarton Academy Junior (Miss Helen McDougall), Dumbarton Academy Senior (Mr. John Urquhart), Knoxland Boys' Choir (Miss N. Armstrong), and Bridgend U.F. Church (Mr. R. A. Read). In the adult choral classes capital work was done, top places being taken by Denny Bros. Male-Voice Choir (Mr. R. A. Reid), Glasgow Police Male-Voice Choir (Mr. Thorpe Davie), and Mr. Thorpe Davie's Choir; worthy seconds being the Dumbarton Choral Union (Mr. James D. Fleming), the Babcock & Wilcox Male-Voice Choir (Mr. William Grant), and the Glasgow Corporation Male-Voice Choir (Mr. W. H. Phillips). An outstanding bit of singing was that of a boys' choir from North Kelvinside Higher Grade (Miss A. W. Thomson).

The seventh junior competitive Festival at MANSFIELD was held by the Co-operative Society on January 24. At BACUP a Festival promoted by the Bacup Division of the St. John Ambulance Brigade produced some very good competitions on January 24 (junior) and January 31 (senior). Rossendale Slipper Workers' Union (Mr. H. Hitch) carried off the prize for mixed-voice choirs.

FESTIVALS IN MARCH

We have received information of the following Festivals:

BEDFORD Festival opens on March 2 with a record number of entries.

BRIGG (NORTH LINCS COMPETITIONS).—March 31 and April 1.

CARLISLE.—March 10-14. The classes are nearly all choral, and two hundred and forty entries have been received, including ten new choirs.

LEAGUE OF ARTS, LONDON.—The second Competition Festival will be held at the Guildhouse, Eccleston Square, on March 26, 27, and 28.

LONDONDERRY FEIS.—March 10-13. Evening concert, March 14.

MANSFIELD.—March 13 and 14.

PERTHSHIRE Festival will be held during the week commencing March 6.

RETFORD (NORTH NOTTS COMPETITIONS).—March 24 and 25.

WINCHESTER AND COUNTY Musical Festival has been extended to five days—March 16 to 20—and each day's work will conclude with a concert. Mr. Adrian C. Boult conducts on March 19, Dr. Malcolm Sargent at the other four concerts. Two scholarships at Bournemouth Conservatoire are open for competition.

Music in the Provinces

ARUNDEL.—The Arundel Choral Society—a choir and orchestra of ninety, under the direction of Mr. Norman F. Demuth—displayed its enterprise on January 28 in a programme that included Holst's 'Ode to Death' and Warlock's 'Three Carols.' Both works were popular with the audience.

BANBURY.—The Birmingham City Orchestra, under Mr. Adrian C. Boult, gave a concert at the Church House on January 20, the programme including a 'Brandenburg' Concerto, a Mozart Serenade, the 'Siegfried Idyll,' Holst's two 'Songs without Words,' and Honegger's 'Pastorale d'Été.'

BEDFORD.—The Musical Society made an innovation on February 5 by giving an orchestral concert. Mr. Herbert J. Colson conducted fifty players in Beethoven's fifth Symphony, and other works, and Dr. Harding conducted his two Egyptian Dances.

BIRMINGHAM AND DISTRICT.—An addition has been made to the city's chamber music. Led by Mr. Paul Beard, Messrs. T. Jones (second violin), Frank Venton (viola), and J. Hock ('cello) have formed a string quartet, called the Philharmonic String Quartet, which made its first appearance at a mid-day concert. A movement from Turiña's String Quartet and from Beethoven's B flat Quartet were given. All the players possess a fine technique, and the right style for chamber music; when they have found their feet in the matter of ensemble great things may be expected from them.——The Beethoven Pianoforte Trio in E flat, Op. 70, was played at a mid-day concert on February 5 by Miss Beatrice Hewitt and Messrs. Frank Venton and J. Hock.——At a concert given by the Arthur Hytch Quartet, Schubert's A minor Quartet and the Beethoven Op. 127 were played. Mr. Robert Parker sang Brahms's four Serious Songs very beautifully. His treatment was vigorous, yet he caught the deeply religious note perfectly.——At a Sunday night concert on January 24 an Old English Suite arranged for orchestra by Gordon Jacobs was given. It was greatly enjoyed by the audience. Haydn's Symphony in E flat, Beethoven's 'Fidelio' Overture, and Butterworth's 'Banks of the Green Willow' were included in the same programme. The vocalist of the evening was Miss Alice Moxon.——Miss Denne Parker, a singer of fine musicianship, sang three of Bantock's 'Sappho' songs, and several songs by Sibelius at a subsequent concert. Bantock's 'Pierrot of the Minute,' the Suite from the music to 'The Good-Humoured Ladies,' arranged for orchestra by Tommasini, Holst's 'Beni-Mora' Suite, and an arrangement of two ancient Jewish airs, by Bertram Benas, completed an interesting programme.——Two pieces by Dr. Whittaker—an arrangement of the Northumbrian folk-tune 'Squire Dacre' and three 'Mood Pictures'—were the novelties at a concert on February 1. Beethoven's seventh Symphony was also given, and Miss Doris Lorton sang the 'Ah! perfido' aria to admiration.——A visit from Miss Fanny Davies to play Mozart's G major Pianoforte Concerto was the outstanding feature of an orchestral concert under Mr. Eugène Goossens on January 27. Those who love the music of Granville Bantock must have enjoyed a fine performance of his 'Hebridean' Symphony on this occasion. Tchaikovsky's 'Francesca da Rimini' was also given.——The Festival Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Adrian C. Boult, gave a performance of Vaughan Williams's 'Sea' Symphony on February 12. The part-writing in this work is no easy matter for any choir to tackle, but the singers rose to the occasion splendidly. There were few mishaps, and the big, serious note in the work was well caught. Miss Dorothy Silk and Mr. Topliss Green were the soloists. Mr. Green's voice was too rough for many of the quieter passages, but his singing was always sincere. Miss Silk gave us some thrilling moments; her voice stood out gloriously against the choir and orchestra, and every phrase was superbly managed. At the same concert a first performance of Graham Godfrey's 'Blake' was given. The work is a setting of Newbolt's poem of that name, and is written for baritone solo, chorus, and orchestra. The part-writing is good, and the orchestration less so; but both poem and music have a tinge of the commonplace. There were good moments, however, and the singers did well with the work. ——Recent visitors have included Madame Fachiri, Mr. Harold Samuel, and Miss Maggie Teyte.

BLACKPOOL.—The Rosé Quartet came to Blackpool for the Chamber Concert Society on February 10, and played the Debussy Quartet, Mendelssohn's in E minor, and one of Beethoven's, before a large audience at the Hotel Metropole.

BOGNOR.—The Bognor Philharmonic Society surpassed all its previous efforts on February 10, when it performed 'The Creation' and 'Blest Pair of Sirens' under the direction of Mr. A. G. Whitehead.

BOLTON.—The Choral Union's third concert of the season was a great event, for the Hallé Orchestra and Mr. Hamilton Harty came and took charge of the programme. Tchaikovsky's 'Francesca da Rimini,' Elgar's 'Enigma' Variations, and the Handel-Harty 'Water Music' were the chief orchestral works. The choir and orchestra joined forces in Maclean's choral scena, 'At the Eastern Gate' (from 'Quentin Durward') and Coleridge-Taylor's 'Kubla Khan.'

BOURNEMOUTH.—Recent programmes at the Winter Gardens have included the following: Holbrooke's 'The Birds of Rhiannon' and Violin Concerto 'The Grasshopper,' Glazounov's fifth Symphony, Dvorák's Overture 'Otello,' Schumann's first Symphony, Mr. Robert Chignell's tone-poem 'Romeo and Juliet' (conducted by the composer), Brahms's second Symphony, Chabrier's 'Spanish Rhapsody,' Bantock's 'Hebridean' Symphony, and Holst's 'Japanese Suite.'

BRADFORD.—Mr. Samuel Midgley gave his first pianoforte recital on his seventy-fifth birthday, January 26. He played three sets of variations—Handel, Reinecke, and Henselt, some Beethoven and Bach, and some later works. ——On January 30, Mr. Hamilton Harty conducted the Hallé Orchestra in Berlioz's 'Beatrice and Benedict' Overture, the Suite on Strauss's 'Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme,' Mozart's A major Violin Concerto (Mr. Catterall), and Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony. —— On the following evening the Bradford Permanent Orchestra played Beethoven's fifth Symphony and the 'Valkyrie' Finale (sung by Mr. Horace Stevens), under Mr. Julius Harrison.—— The B.N.O.C. opened its season at the Alhambra on February 2, and remained in possession until February 14, giving a wonderful repertory, and maintaining the Company's well-known standard throughout. 'Hugh the Drover' was first in the bill.

BRISTOL.—Mr. Clifford Hellier played Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto at a concert of the Colston Hall Orchestra on January 24, Mr. Pease Clarke conducting.——Elgar's second Symphony was played at the Philharmonic Society's concert on January 31, under the direction of Mr. Arnold Barter. It was an ambitious effort, creditably carried out. Frank Bridge's Suite, 'The Sea,' and Beethoven's fourth Pianoforte Concerto, played by Miss Irene Scharrer, were in the programme, to which the choir of the Society contributed a few very well chosen part-songs.——Bristol Choral Society gave 'Elijah' on February 7, and Fry's Musical Society 'The Revenge' on February 10.

CAMBRIDGE.—'Semele,' described in another column, has been the event of the season.——One of the recent Saturday 'Pops.' provided the Kendall String Quartet, the Trinity Madrigal Society, Mr. George Parker (all of whom had been performing to an afternoon audience of children), and others. The organizer was the Precentor of Trinity, Mr. Dennis Jones.——The O'Mara Company and Mr. Moiseiwitsch have been among the visitors.——It is hoped that Messrs. Miller & Son will succeed in bringing the London String Quartet to Cambridge for a Beethoven week in November.

CANTERBURY.—Mr. Fred Adlington's Old English Chamber Orchestra, from London, played 17th- and 18th-century music to a large audience at the Chapter House on January 29. Most of the music was by Purcell, including the songs sung by Miss Eva Sparkes and Mr. Gerald Montague.

CHATHAM.—The Medway Symphony Orchestra, forty-three strong, has been brought into being by Mr. Huan Mitchell, who conducted its first concert on January 17—the 'Egmont' Overture, the first movement of the 'Unfinished' Symphony, and lighter things.

CHELTENHAM.—Mr. Harold Samuel and Miss Maggie Teyte were the artists at the Mossel concert on January 22. Before proceeding to Bach, Mr. Samuel played some pieces by Morley, Byrd, John Bull, Scarlatti, Rameau, and Paradies.

CHESTER.—Chamber music for violin, violoncello, and pianoforte has been prominent. Mr. Alby Hull, Mr. F. W. Hague, and Mr. A. B. Coleman (the 'Chester Trio') played Beethoven, Gade, and Schutt on January 24; Mr. T. B. Sidebottom, Mr. E. A. Wright, and Mr. Emily Gibs gave the Dvorák 'Dumky' Trio and Beethoven's B flat on February 2.

CHESTERFIELD.—The Pirani Trio played Frank Bridge's Phantasie Trio in the Corporation Theatre on January 20, the concert being in the Stephenson series. Miss Miriam Licette and Mr. Norman Allin also took part.

CHICHESTER.—Owing to Dr. Read's illness Mr. A. G. Whitehead was called in to conduct the Musical Society in Parry's 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day,' on January 27. Now Dr. Read's death is mourned, and musical Chichester has lost its best friend. An obituary notice appears on p. 268.

CLARE.—A selection from 'Judas Maccabæus' was given by the Choral Society under Mr. E. F. Harty on February 4, and in the second part of the programme the orchestra played the 'Unfinished' Symphony.

CLIFTON.—The chamber concert at the Music Club on February 10 was noteworthy for the performance of String Sextets—Brahms in G major (Op. 36) and Tchaikovsky in D minor (Op. 70).

COLCHESTER.—Madrigals and part-songs were sung by the Colchester and District Musical Society on February 7, under Mr. W. F. Kingdon's direction. Mr. E. H. Turner played a Handel Organ Concerto, and the orchestra gave the 'Egmont' Overture, the 'Siegfried Idyll,' and Vaughan Williams's 'Folk-Song' Suite.

CORSHAM.—Cowen's 'Rose-Maiden' and Brahms's 'Song of Destiny' were chosen for performance by the Corsham Choral Society, under Mr. Lewin Spackman, on February 11.

COVENTRY.—The annual concert of the Musical Club Male-Voice Choir on February 5 was a great success. Mr. John Chapman conducted.——The Chamber Music Society provided a violin and pianoforte recital by Mr. Arthur Catterall and Miss Lucy Pierce on February 9.

DERBY.—The Co-operative Senior Choir gave an excellent programme at Central Hall on January 30, —'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast,' Morley's five-part madrigal, 'Lo, she flies,' Parry's 'My delight and thy delight,' and Ethel Boyce's 'Corinna,' for ladies' voices. Mr. F. J. Stevenson conducted.——The Catterall Quartet came on February 6, and was joined by Mr. R. J. Forbes in the César Franck Pianoforte Quintet.

DOVER.—Lloyd's Pastoral, 'The Rosy Dawn,' was sung by the Choral Union on January 30, and the programme further included 'Sea-Girt England,' by Mr. H. J. Taylor, the conductor, and his 'Dover Triumph Song.'

HANLEY.—The London Symphony Orchestra and Sir Thomas Beecham gave a concert on January 27 with the following programme: 'Les Préludes' (Liszt), 'Siegfried Idyll,' 'Shepherd's Hey' (Grainger), Aria from Mozart's fifteenth Divertimento, Dances from 'Prince Igor,' and the 'Pathetic' Symphony.——On February 5, the North Staffordshire Symphony Orchestra, composed chiefly of amateurs, was joined by Miss Marjorie Hayward in the E major Bach Concerto. Mr. John Cope conducted.

HARTLEPOOL.—The Hartlepools Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. J. F. Chalmers Park, played a good mixed programme at West Hartlepool on January 28. Included in it were Haydn's 'London' Symphony, two movements from Beethoven's first, and Mendelssohn's 'Capriccio Brillant,' with Miss Katrina Egan as soloist. The programme was repeated at Hartlepool Town Hall a week later.

HUDDERSFIELD.—Miss Edith Robinson, Mr. Carl Fuchs, and Mr. Frank Merrick played the Ravel Trio, Mozart in E, and Brahms in C major (Op. 87), on January 21. ——The Musical Club brought the Hungarian String Quartet to Huddersfield on February 11. Bartók's first Quartet, Op. 7, was played.

HULL.—Close on the heels of Sir Henry Wood and the Queen's Hall Orchestra came Sir Thomas Beecham and the London Symphony Orchestra, on January 19, with the programme recorded above under Hanley.——Hull Ladies' Musical Union, trained to an excellent standard, and conducted by Miss Eleanor Coward, gave a very satisfying concert on February 5. The programme included an excerpt from Pergolesi's 'Stabat Mater.'

IPSWICH.—The Ipswich Choral Society again showed its capacity and thoroughness on January 21 by performing Dvorák's 'The Spectre's Bride' and Parry's 'Blest pair of Sirens' in first-rate style, under Mr. W. H. Dixon. The orchestra did its work well, and a success was won by the soprano, Miss Olive Sturgess, who is an East Anglian.

KENDAL.—A chamber concert was given on January 30 at the Town Hall, the principal feature being Dvorák's 'Dumky' Trio, played by Mr. Alfred Barker, Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees, and Mr. John Wills.

KENILWORTH.—About forty singers of the Birmingham City Choir came to the Picture House on February 4, and gave an excellent choral concert, under Mr. Joseph Lewis. The programme included Bantock's 'My love is like a red, red rose,' Balfour Gardiner's 'Cargoes,' and some of Stanford's 'Songs of the Sea.'

KIDDERMINSTER.—Elgar's 'Go, song of mine' was in the programme given by the Choral Society on February 4. This was the forty-first concert given by the Society, which was founded in 1899.

LEEDS.—Elgar's Pianoforte Quintet was played at the Scala on January 23, with Miss Kathleen Frise-Smith as the pianist, and Mr. Catterall as first violin.——An excellent programme was given by Mr. Edward Maude and his string orchestra at the University, on January 24. It included Bantock's Suite arranged from the virginal music of Farnaby, Corelli's eighth Concerto, Ernest Austin's 'Vicar of Bray' Variations, Elgar's Introduction and Allegro, and Holst's 'St. Paul's' Suite. Mr. Raymond Hartley sang Vaughan Williams's 'Shropshire Lad' song-cycle.——The Choral Union, conducted by Dr. Coward, gave a fine performance of Berlioz's 'Faust' on February 4. Miss Olga Haley, Mr. Tudor Davies, and Mr. Charles Knowles were the soloists.——At the Saturday Orchestral Concert on February 7, Mr. Goossens conducted Strauss's 'Tod und Verklärung' and Schumann's D minor Symphony. There is a danger that these concerts may be abandoned, the average attendance having fallen from nineteen hundred during last season to thirteen hundred this year. Broadcasting is said to be the cause.

LIVERPOOL.—At the Philharmonic Concert on January 27, M. Mitja Nikisch made a great impression with his pianoforte playing in Brahms's D minor Concerto. Sir Henry Wood's orchestral Suite on pieces by Bach, McEwen's 'Grey Galloway,' and three Spanish Dances of Granados were other features of a varied programme. Under Dr. Pollitt, the choir sang Elgar's 'Go, song of mine' and 'O happy eyes.'——At Picton Hall, on January 31, Miss Allen spoke in illustration of orchestral works played to children in the afternoon and adults in the evening.——The Kedroff Quartet sang at a Vickers concert on February 7, and was enthusiastically received.——Recitals have been given by Mr. Harold Samuel and M. Nikisch.——The Catterall String Quartet and Mr. Charles Kelly played Dohnányi's second Pianoforte Quintet at the Rodewald concert on January 27.

MANCHESTER.—The Glasgow Orpheus Choir sang at Free Trade Hall on the evening of January 24, and Manchester gave only a half-empty hall. In return Mr. Roberton's choir poured out choral tone to be envied by any choir in England.——The last Hallé concerts in January brought Beethoven's eighth Symphony, Herbert Howells's 'Pastoral Rhapsody,' two of Debussy's 'Nocturnes,' and Mr. Catterall in the Beethoven Violin Concerto (January 22); Suggia in the Schumann Violoncello Concerto (Op. 129), Turiña's 'La Procession du Rocio,' and Brahms's third Symphony (January 29). On February 4 there was a masterly performance of 'The Dream of Gerontius,' with Miss Ivy Phillips, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. Joseph Farrington in the solo parts. The choir also gave Bach's 'Be not afraid.' A week later, Mr. Harty gave Schubert's ninth Symphony and Stanford's first 'Irish Rhapsody,' and Mr. Twelvetrees played Tchaikovsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme for violoncello and orchestra.——Sir Henry Wood gave a Wagner evening at the Brand Lane concert on January 31.——There has been an abundance of chamber music, including the Brodsky Quartet in Mozart and Brahms, the Dutch Quartet in Wolf's 'Italian Serenade,' and the Voorsanger Quartet in Frank Bridge's Fantasie.——The programme of the C.W.S. Choir's concert, on February 11, contained Prothero's 'The Nun of Nidaros' and a setting of Moore's 'At the mid-hour of night,' by Herman Brearley, conductor of the Blackburn choir.——The recital list includes Miss Harriet Cohen, M. Sapellnikov with Mr. Ingo Simon, and Miss Helen Henschel.

MIDDLESBROUGH.—On January 20, the London Symphony Orchestra and Sir Thomas Beecham came to the Town Hall, and gave the programme which these players have adopted for their tour.

NEWCASTLE.—The Philharmonic Orchestra gave a varied programme under Mr. Edward Clark on February 1. It included Bainton's 'Three Pieces for Orchestra,' a Handel Concerto Grosso, and Mozart's D major Symphony, No. 38.——The Bach Choir sang four of Bach's Cantatas in the Cathedral, on February 7, under Dr. Whittaker. with an excellent small orchestra for the accompaniment. Solos were taken by Miss Ida Cowey, Miss Annie Lawton, and members of the Cathedral choir.

NORWICH.—Handel's 'Ode on St. Cecilia's Day' was given in St. Andrew's Hall on January 22 by the Philharmonic Society, under Dr. Bates. Miss Elsie Suddaby, Mr. Arthur Jordan, and Mr. Arthur Cranmer sang the solos. A selection from Rutland Boughton's 'The Immortal Hour' made the second part of the programme. ——Miss Kathleen Long played Couperin, Mozart, Bartók, and Debussy at the pianoforte on January 28.——The Municipal Concerts continue an excellent course with orchestra and military band on Saturday evenings and Sunday afternoons. Miss Harriet Cohen, Miss Dora Labbette, and other soloists of high rank have taken part.

NOTTINGHAM.—The 'Hiawatha' cycle was given by the Sacred Harmonic Society on February 11. Mr. Frank Idle conducted in the place of Mr. Allen Gill, who was indisposed, and a performance of all-round merit was a credit to all concerned. Mr. Roy Henderson, who distinguished himself as the baritone soloist, is a native of Nottingham.——First among other interests of the month was Miss Cantelo's association with the Catterall String Quartet in the Schumann Pianoforte Quintet on February 4.

OLDHAM.—The Male-Voice Society gave a concert on January 20 under Mr. Harry Hannam, Mendelssohn's 'To the Sons of Art' being prominent in the programme.—— Mr. Arthur Catterall and Mr. John Wills played Mozart for the Chamber Music Society on February 3.

OXFORD.—'Samson' was given by the West Oxford Vocal Society in January, under the direction of Dr. Harris. It was said that 'Samson' had not been performed at Oxford for about forty years. In 'Let the bright Seraphim,' sung by Miss Steventon, the trumpet obbligato was played on the organ by Dr. Ley.——On January 30, at the fourth Subscription Concert, Mr. Anthony Bernard conducted a chamber orchestra in Respighi's 'Old Airs and Dances,' Honegger's 'Pastorale d'Été,' Ravel's 'Le Tombeau de Couperin,' Holst's Fugal Concerto for flute and oboe, a Concerto by C. Ph. E. Bach, and a Haydn Symphony.

PORTSMOUTH.—The choir of Portsmouth Philharmonic Society showed its advanced powers, on January 29, in giving admirable performances of Vaughan Williams's 'Toward the Unknown Region' and Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens,' under Dr. Malcolm Sargent. The purely orchestral works in an interesting programme were the 'New World' Symphony and Dr. Sargent's 'Impression of a Windy Day.' Rachmaninov's second Pianoforte Concerto was played by Mr. William Murdoch.

RICHMOND, YORKS.—The first concert of the season given by the Richmondshire Choral Society had a well-chosen programme. It included Vaughan Williams's 'Wassail Song' and Fantasia on Christmas Carols, 'I sowed the seeds of love,' arranged by Holst, and some of Whittaker's arrangements of North Country songs. Mr. Arthur Fountain conducted.

ROCHDALE.—A scheme of five concerts for children from the elementary schools has been arranged by the Education Committee, and Mr. Edward Isaacs has been appointed director. The programmes comprise solo playing and singing, chamber music for strings and pianoforte, vocal quartets, chamber music for wind instruments and pianoforte.——The English Singers sang for the Chamber Concert Society on January 20, and Mr. Frank Greenwood and Mr. Joseph Lingard joined in a Bach Sonata for pianoforte and flute.——The Philharmonic Society gave a successful popular concert on February 10, under Mr. Leach.—At a Town Hall Sunday concert Brahms's Clarinet and Pianoforte Sonata was played by Mr. Harry Mortimer and Mr. George Whitaker, and Todmorden Glee and Madrigal Society sang Bach's 'Blessing, Glory, and Wisdom,' and Cornelius's 'The Surrender of the Soul,' also some madrigals and modern English part-songs.——Other noteworthy events include a Schumann song recital by Mr. Charles Neville, with Mr. George Whitaker as lecturer, and a performance of Brahms's G major Violin and Pianoforte Sonata by Mr. Philip Whiteway and Mr. Walter Dykes.

ST. HELENS.—Mr. Hamilton Harty and the Hallé Orchestra played at one of Mr. Beckett's subscription concerts on February 3. The programme included Beethoven's eighth Symphony (omitting the Finale), a 'Meistersinger' selection, Liadov's 'Musical Box,' and Smetana's 'Bartered Bride' Overture.

SHEFFIELD.—At the subscription concert on February 10, the Queen's Hall Orchestra, conducted by Sir Henry Wood, played Schumann's 'Manfred' Overture, Dohnányi's Suite Op. 19, Beethoven's fourth Symphony, and—with Miss May Harrison and Miss Beatrice Harrison—the Brahms Concerto for violin and violoncello.——Two recent University recital programmes have included Violoncello Sonatas of Bach and Brahms (Miss Helen Mott), and the Trio on Breton folk-songs by Jean Huré. Mrs. Leathes, organizer of the concerts, was pianist on each occasion.——Mr. Alan Morton and Mr. Stanley Kaye played Widor's Sonata in A for violoncello and pianoforte at a Foxon Five o'Clock concert.——Recitals have been given by Madame Gerhardt and by Miss F. Playford Hague (vocalist) and Miss Hilda Francis (pianoforte).

SOUTHAMPTON.—Beethoven's seventh Symphony and Schubert's 'Unfinished' were part of a long programme given by the Test Valley Orchestral Society, under Mr. Frank Bartlett, on February 10. Wind players were brought from the chief London orchestras, and the performance attained a high standard.

SOUTHPORT.—A miscellaneous programme was given by the Southport United Choir for its second concert on February 3. The Choir sang, among other things, Parry's 'Blest Pair of Sirens' and Bruch's 'On Jordan's Banks.' Mr. Kingsley Killin conducted.——On February 6 the Orchestral Society, under Mr. Matthews, played Elgar's 'In the South,' Berlioz's 'Carneval Romain,' and, with Mr. Maurice Cole, Saint-Saëns's G minor Pianoforte Concerto.

STOCKPORT.—The choral pieces sung by the Stockport Vocal Union at its concert on January 19 included Bantock's seven-part 'Jack and Joan,' Coleridge-Taylor's 'Dead in the Sierras,' Webbe's 'When winds breathe soft,' and Bach's 'Be not afraid,' for double choir. Dr. T. Keighley conducted.

STRATFORD-ON-AVON.—The Choral and Orchestral Society gave its first concert of the season on January 22, Mr. Allen K. Blackall conducting. The Choir sang Stanford's 'The Revenge' and Bridge's 'The Flag of England,' and the orchestra played the 'Gressenhall Suite,' by F. Cunningham Woods.

WARRINGTON.—The concert of the Male Choral Union, conducted by Mr. A. Higson, was well attended. The programme included Bantock's 'Ballade,' Fletcher's 'Lullaby of Love,' James Lyon's 'Men of Eric,' and West's arrangement of 'John Peel.'

WOKING.—Miss Dorothy Silk sang to the accompaniment of the Birmingham String Quartet at the Woking Boys' Secondary School, on January 22. The Quartet played Haydn and Dittersdorf.

WOODBRIDGE.—Under Mr. Alfred J. Dye, the Orchestral Society gave a concert on February 3, the programme including two movements from the 'Jupiter' Symphony, the 'Peer Gynt' Suite, the 'Prometheus' Overture, and the Finale from a Holst Suite for strings.

YORK.—The Philharmonic Quartet—the title adopted by Mr. Paul Beard (violin), Mr. Frank Venton (viola), Mr. J. C. Hock (violoncello), and Mr. C. Kelly (pianoforte)—played the Strauss Quartet, that of Brahms in G minor, and Fauré's in C minor, for the British Music Society, on January 24.

Music in Scotland

DUNDEE.—At the annual concert of the Amateur Choral Union, on February 4, Brahms's 'Requiem,' Bach's Concerto for two violins, and the same composer's Cantata, 'Wachet Auf!' were performed with the Scottish Orchestra. The soloists were Miss Dorothy Silk and Mr. Herbert Heyner. Mr. Horace Fellowes and Mr. L. A. Connabeer played the Concerto, and Mr. Charles M. Cowe conducted.

EDINBURGH.—The Scottish Orchestra programmes at the Paterson Orchestral Concerts were generally similar to those noticed under 'Glasgow.' Nicolas Orloff made a return visit to Edinburgh and Glasgow, and in the 'Emperor' Concerto and a group of solos showed the same high pianistic excellences as before, but his conception of the Concerto hardly did justice to its heroic and distinctly masculine qualities.——Prof. Donald F. Tovey's unfortunate illness has thrown on to other shoulders the heavy burden of carrying on in his absence the three musical enterprises with which he is mainly associated at Edinburgh—the Reid Orchestra, the Sunday Concerts, and the University Historical Concerts.——At the fifth Reid Orchestra Concert, Mr. Adrian C. Boult secured a sound reading of Brahms's third Symphony and other contrasting items. At the sixth, Prof. Granville Bantock, looking more shaggily Brahms-like than ever, made a successful first appearance as an orchestral conductor at Edinburgh, piloting the orchestra skilfully through the difficulties of Brahms's fourth Symphony. Other features of interest at this concert were a Mozart Concerto for flute, harp, and orchestra, and the appearance of Mr. Paul della Torre, a well-known Edinburgh musician, as conductor of his own new 'Virgil' Overture.

——At the Sunday Concerts Prof. Tovey's coadjutors kept his flag flying with interesting performances of a number of chamber classics, familiar and unfamiliar, including Beethoven's Horn Sonata, Brahms's Horn Trio, and a Tartini 'Cello Concerto.——The programme of the third Reid Historical Concert at the University comprised Brahms's String Sextet, Op. 36, Schubert's String Quintet, Op. 163, and an elaborate set of Variations for flute and string quartet, written by Prof. Tovey himself on a theme by Gluck.

GLASGOW.—Vaclav Talich completed a four weeks' engagement with the Scottish Orchestra, and had a most enthusiastic send-off, having made a complete capture of the musical publics of Glasgow and Edinburgh. Already arrangements are in progress for a longer visit from him next winter. The two concerts following Talich's departure were directed by the veteran Sir George Henschel, whose methods and choice of programmes bore by contrast a rather old-fashioned lavender-like air, but a serenely happy presentation of Beethoven's fourth Symphony helped to compensate for a good deal of dullness elsewhere. Incidentally, Sir George's visit proved useful as indicating that things were not quite the same as when he first directed the Scottish Orchestra thirty years ago. For the annual plebiscite concert, which concludes the Scottish Orchestra season at Glasgow, the programme was mainly on conventional lines, including such established favourites as the 'Unfinished' Symphony,' the 'Leonora' and 'Mastersingers' Overtures, the 'Peer Gynt Suite, &c., although Respighi's 'Fountains of Rome' represented a slight break-away. Mr. Aylmer Buesst was brought from London to conduct this concert. Why, after hearing him, we cannot imagine. Reviewing all our experience we cannot recall another case of an orchestral conductor standing so completely outside the music he was directing. Neat, competent, confident—yes; but negative to the point of whiteness.——The Glasgow Choral Union and the Scottish Orchestra joined forces in Bach's great 'Magnificat,' Delius's 'Sea Drift,' and Elgar's 'Music-Makers.' The work of the Choral Union was hardly up to the standard of its previous appearances this season. The 'Music-Makers' was sung intelligently and with confidence, and the difficulties of the Delius work were bravely surmounted, the music itself making a deep impression on the audience, but the chorus work in the Bach 'Magnificat' seemed hurried and blurred, lacking the stateliness of poise, security of movement, and cleanness of edge which the music calls for, and the soloists were undistinguished. Robert Franz's 'additional accompaniments,' which we heard for the first time, appeared to us to be equivalent to improving a Michael Angelo statue by furbishing it about with prettily coloured ribbons. Mr. Wilfrid Senior, who conducted with authority, secured the best result of the evening in the 'Gerontius' Prelude for orchestra. —— The Glasgow Bach Society's new string orchestra made its second public appearance at a Bach chamber concert in Rankine Hall, the programme including the C minor Concerto for two pianofortes and strings, and the 'Brandenburg' Concertos, No. 5, in D, for flute, violin, pianoforte, and strings, and No. 3, in G, for ten-part string orchestra and continuo. The enthusiasm was considerable, and part of the programme had to be repeated. A first-rate group of soloists comprised Miss Ailie Cullen and Mr. Wilfrid Senior (pianoforte), Miss Bessie Spence (violin), and Mr. Alfred Piction (flaute). Mr. J. Michael Diack and Mr. F. H. Bisset shared the conducting, and the Bach Society's Choir sang a small group of choruses from the 'Peasant' Cantata.——The programme at the last of the international 'celebrity' series of concerts at Glasgow, Edinburgh, and Dundee was in the hands of the London Symphony Orchestra, Sir Thomas Beecham conducting. One felt that there was more personal exuberance and less artistic sensibility about Beecham's work than last year. The 'Symphonie Pathétique' suffered by comparison with Talich's profoundly moving performance at the Scottish Orchestra concerts a few days earlier. And the old 'stunt' of laying down the baton in the five-four movement (which we used to have from Cowen twenty years ago) has surely been dead for at least a decade. In any case, the effect—despite Sir Thomas's vigorous head-waggings—was deplorable. But he gave us one performance of rare beauty in a Mozart 'Divertimento.'——Mr. Harold Samuel and Miss Maggie Teyte have led the way among recitalists of the month. They visited Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dundee, and Bridge of Allan under Mr. Max Mossel's direction.——The Glasgow Orpheus Choir sang at Manchester. Perth, Dumbarton, and Rothesay. The Manchester visit was a first one, and the audience was not large, but the enthusiasm was great and the critics almost lyrical in their praise.——The Barr and Stroud Male-Voice Choir, a well-equipped works choir conducted by Mr. James H. Gibson, gave a concert of part-songs in the Barr and Stroud Recreation Hall at Anniesland.

GREENOCK. — The Greenock Male-Voice Choir (conductor, Mr. A. J. Gourlay), at present the most accomplished male-voice choir in Scotland, gave a highly successful concert in Greenock Town Hall, the most ambitious effort being Elgar's 'Reveille.' The programme of a concert by the Greenock Orchestral Society (conductor, Mr. J. Peebles Conn) included a Mendelssohn Symphony and Gluck's 'Iphigenia in Aulis' Overture.

OTHER TOWNS.—The Paisley Lyric Choir, conducted by a competitive festival veteran, Mr. Charles Rennie, gave a programme of part-songs in the George Clark Town Hall, Paisley.——The Budapest String Quartet visited Kirkcaldy under the ægis of the Kirkcaldy Chamber Music Association, this being only the Quartet's second appearance in Great Britain. Enterprising Kirkcaldy !——At the fourth Helensburgh Subscription Concert, the Rosé String Quartet from Vienna played Quartets by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, and Debussy.

SEBASTIAN.

Music in Wales

ABERYSTWYTH. — At its hundred-and-sixty-second concert, on January 22, Sir Walford Davies conducted the College Orchestra in Handel's Overture to 'Arminius,' previously pointing out special features in the work, and Dr. David de Lloyd conducted Mozart's Overture to 'Der Schauspieldirektor,' the first movement of Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony, and Holst's 'St. Paul's' Suite for strings.——At the next concert, on January 29, Mr. W. R. Allen conducted the College Choral Union in a selection from Coleridge-Taylor's 'Hiawatha' and two Motets by Parry—'Never weather-beaten sail' and 'There is an old belief.' Sir Walford Davies conducted a small choir in a Palestrina Motet, 'Beauty Eternal,' and Walmisley's Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in D minor, contrasting the two different styles of part-writing in Church music.——The hundred-and-sixty-fourth concert, on February 5, was devoted mainly to a violin recital by the sisters d'Aranyi, who were accompanied by Sir Walford Davies in a magnificent performance of Bach's Double Concerto for two violins.

CARDIFF. — The outstanding event is, of course, Paderewski's recital on February 7, at Park Hall, where he opened his campaign on behalf of Earl Haig's British Legion Appeal Fund. There was a great audience, and the occasion was impressive.——The Cardiff Blue Ribbon Choir gave its forty-third concert on February 16, when Mozart's 'Requiem Mass' and Stanford's 'The Revenge' were performed, along with a short miscellaneous programme. Mr. Jenkyn Morris conducted, Mr. Herbert Ware leading the orchestra.——Cardiff Musical Society gave an excellent programme, under Mr. T. E. Aylward, on January 28. It began and ended with Bach Cantatas—'Bide with us' and 'O Light Everlasting'—and included Cornelius's 'The Surrender of the Soul.'

EBBW VALE.—The Ebbw Vale and District Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Tom Davies, performed Elgar's 'The Kingdom' on February 8. It is understood that the choir met twice a week for thirteen months in order to master the difficulties of the work. This sort of thing is by no means rare in the villages and country districts of Wales.

HARLECH.—Mr. Joseph Holbrooke and Prof. Granville Bantock played pianoforte duets, including Holbrooke's Variations on 'Three Blind Mice,' on January 21.

NEWPORT.—The Victoria Orchestral Society, an amateur body organized and conducted by Mr. A. E. J. Holland, gave its fifth concert at Newport on February 5, the programme including Mendelssohn's 'Italian' Symphony and Eric Coates's Suite, 'Joyous Youth.'

PONTYPRIDD.—'The Last Judgment' was sung by the Graig C.M. Choral Society on January 28 and 29, under the direction of Mr. J. Stanley John.

RHOS.—It has been an object of keen desire in this mining village to form a choral society for purposes other than competition. This has now been realised, and a choir of a hundred and fifty voices has been formed, with Dr. C. Roberts as conductor. A first performance took place on January 23, when 'The Messiah' was successfully given with a local orchestra, assisted by a few professional players from North Wales.

Music in Ireland

At Ulster Hall, Belfast, on January 16, Mr. Hamilton Harty and his glorious band secured little short of a triumph. The composer-conductor's 'Irish' Symphony evoked unbounded enthusiasm, especially the movements containing 'The Boyne Water' (a wonderful contrast to the touching arrangement of 'Jimmy mo veela sthore') and the rollicking Irish tune, 'The girl I left behind me.' Mr. Harty was made to respond to a triple encore, and a fourth round of applause was rightly accorded to the orchestra for its superb performance of this delightful Symphony. Dr. Lawrence Walker gave an interesting course of lectures on 'The Appreciation of Music,' at Queen's University, Belfast, in the second half of January. Capt. C. J. Brennan delivered the third of his series of lectures on 'The Evolution of Vocal Music,' at Queen's University, Belfast, on February 2, with musical illustrations. The Belfast Philharmonic Society, under the baton of Mr. E. Godfrey-Brown, gave a delightful concert on February 6, the chief item being a tone-poem, 'To Wonder,' by Dr. E. Norman Hay, specially composed for the Jubilee of the Society, and admirably conducted by the composer.

On January 17, Dublin had the opportunity of welcoming Mr. Harty and the Hallé players. The two most popular items were Stanford's 'Irish' Rhapsody, and the Overture to 'The Bartered Bride.' The attendance was not worthy of the Free State capital. The Catterall Quartet—plus a clarinet player, Mr. Harry Mortimer—gave an enjoyable recital under the auspices of the Royal Dublin Society, on January 19. The Mozart Quintet was particularly appreciated. A new vocal organization, called the Dublin Philharmonic Choral Society, has been formed at Dublin. The first sectional rehearsals were held on January 27, followed by a full rehearsal on February 3. On January 28 and 29, Dr. George Hewson gave two unique organ recitals in St. Patrick's Cathedral, when he was heard in a programme demanding exceptional technique. Both recitals were devoted exclusively to Bach. Mr. Arthur Rubinstein's pianoforte recital of modern music, on January 26, given in connection with the Royal Dublin Society, displayed amazing virtuosity. On February 2 an orchestral recital took place, under the direction of Dr. John F. Larchet.

The twenty-ninth Feis Ceoil syllabus for the Dublin Competitions commencing May 4, has been issued. The following will be the adjudicators: Miss Denne Parker, Prof. Granville Bantock, Dr. E. C. Bairstow, Prof. O'Dwyer, Messrs. W. H. Reed, Charles Reddie, Arthur Darley, D. J. O'Sullivan, and E. O'Neill.

Quite an attractive syllabus has also been issued for the Father Mathew, Dublin, Feis, during the forthcoming Easter week. Not alone is music catered for, but also art, the languages, recitation, dancing, industries, domestic science, &c.

To the disappointment of many, Dame Clara Butt was unable, through ill-health, to appear at the Dublin Theatre Royal, on January 31. Fortunately, however, the services of Madame Rosina Buckman and Mr. Maurice d'Oisly were secured, who, in addition to Mr. Kennerley Rumford, Mr. W. H. Squire, Miss Marie Antoinette Aussenac, and Mr. Ivor Newton, gave an exceptionally fine treat. At Belfast, on February 2, the same party (save Madame Buckman, who was replaced by Madame Scotney) gave an enjoyable concert.

Through lack of funds, the Lectureship in Irish Music at University College, Dublin, held by Prof. Robert O'Dwyer since 1914, threatens to be discontinued, but a movement is on foot to obtain financial assistance from the County Councils.

The Dublin Symphony Orchestral Concert, at La Scala, Dublin, on February 1, in aid of the Irish National Fishermen's Association, with Mr. Thorpe Bates and Miss Molly O'Callaghan as vocalists, under the direction of Mr. Vincent O'Brien, was most successful.

A very fine programme was performed by the Army School of Music Band, No. 1, at the Theatre Royal, Dublin, on February 8, under the baton of Col. Fritz Brase. An agreeable diversion was the vocal quartet—Miss Gunning, Miss Joan Burke, Mr. Joseph O'Neill, and Mr. Irvine Lynch.

Much sympathy is felt for the loss to Irish folk-song collecting by the death of Miss Honoria Galwey. This venerable lady, who passed away at St. Columb's Court, Derry, aged ninety-five, had been collecting Irish folk-songs for sixty years, and had generously placed them at the disposal of the Irish Folk-Song Society. She was a daughter of the Ven. Archdeacon Galwey, of Derry, a member of the Lota (Co. Cork) family of that name, who died in his ninetieth year.

Lovers of pianoforte music had the opportunity of hearing two recitals by two distinguished pianists, Borschke and Phillipowsky, on February 7 and 9 respectively, at the Theatre Royal, Dublin. Kirillov, the Russian baritone, is announced to appear at La Scala Theatre, Dublin, on February 15 (in aid of the St. John Ambulance Appeal), in addition to the Irish Ladies' Octet, and the fine Band of the Civic Guards, under Supt. F. J. Delaney.

While projects are on foot for a grand Citizens' Hall for Dublin, the new Gresham Hotel, now being built on the old site in O'Connell Street, will have a hall with a seating capacity for over a thousand persons, suitable for concerts, lectures, dances, &c. Dublin has had no adequate concert-hall for ten years.

STRAVINSKY'S 'PULCINELLA' SUITE

Those who are not on friendly terms with musical modernism awaited Stravinsky's 'Pulcinella' Suite with some trepidation. They were agreeably disappointed. This time the fusion of Stravinsky with Pergolesi and Bach proved convincing for the public, though not for those musicians who decide beforehand to dislike all that is written by him and by Schönberg. This series of eight pieces is a crescendo of good humour, and the audience could not fail to respond to it. The witty use of the wind instruments proved exhilarating. When the trombone and the double-bass joined in their duet—a bit of rag-time that did no harm to the Suite as a whole—a storm of applause went through the hall. All this happened at the Berlin Philharmonic. Otto Klemperer, an outstanding personality among the German conductors of to-day, replaced the absent Furtwängler, and arranged this little surprise. This conductor's gifts, which are out of the ordinary, were shown again in the D minor Pianoforte Concerto by Brahms, with Artur Schnabel as soloist. Never before have I heard the orchestral part of this work played with such clarity and expressiveness.

KRENEK'S CONCERTO GROSSO

It was Otto Klemperer again who conducted the first Berlin performance of Ernst Krenek's Concerto Grosso, written for three solo instruments and small orchestra. The predilection for old music indicated in the title gives a basis to the composer's style and form. The influence of Bach appears everywhere, sometimes as a barrier to originality. Contrapuntal formalism easily gets the upper hand over real invention. The young man of twenty-four who wrote this piece is gifted but immature. In one of the five sections Stravinsky appears as his inspiring genius, but Krenek possesses neither the sense of colour nor the spontaneity of the Russian master. The Violin Concerto mentioned in one of my recent letters showed greater elasticity than this Concerto Grosso.

A DISCUSSION ABOUT THE ELEMENTS OF MUSIC

It is typical of the art of music that some hundreds of years after it has come to full life the discussion of its elements still goes on. The question of what music really is has again been put by Paul Bekker, once music critic of the Frankfurter Zeitung, and now wholly devoted to the writing of musical books that are full of matter though not always inspired by the spirit of music itself. He has published a small book entitled 'Von den Naturreichen des Klanges,' which means nothing less than a revolution in the conceptions of musical history. Dividing sound into two realms, viz., the vocal and the instrumental, and referring both to different philosophical sources, he pretends to give a new basis to the abstract consideration of musical ideas. But what he calls the 'phenomenology' of music is strongly contested, not without reason, by Fräulein Lotte Kallenbach. This young musicologue points out what little solidity exists in such foundations as laid by Bekker. She asserts that his principles would destroy both the basis and the unity of music. This controversy will certainly prompt other literature dealing with the subject. It is Bekker's merit to have aroused new interest in the question of musical æsthetics, which so often is handled by writers not very familiar with the subject they profess.

BACH'S B MINOR MASS

A recent performance of Bach's B minor Mass, under Siegfried Ochs, was the thirteenth given by the Philharmonic Choir, now called the High School Choir. It served to show how antiquated the solo arias may sound if they are not given in perfect style. Bad solo singing damages the impression of the whole, and draws attention to the length of this work. The Mass was certainly never intended for performances such as are now to be heard in concert - rooms. The choruses were performed very impressively. ADOLF WEISSMANN.

NEW YORK

Once upon a time there were two or three symphony orchestras in the whole of the United States, and each in its prospectus for the season announced its conductor with no thought (or fear) that more than one captain was needed to guide the craft through such rough or smooth seas as might happen to be. The first innovation was an 'assistant-conductor,' but as he had no definite work allotted to him he soon disappeared, to be succeeded by an 'associate-conductor,' upon whom seemed chiefly to fall the duty of soothing irate composers who considered their efforts neglected. He conducted their undesirable works, and occasionally took charge of ordinary programmes when the chief went a-fishing. When Stransky retired from the Philharmonic, still another innovation was contrived, two conductors being appointed—one for the first half of the season, another for the second. This arrangement lasted for four or five years, Hoogstraten conducting for the first, and Mengelberg for the second half of the winter. The next thing to be forced upon us was a flood of 'guest-conductors.' Nobody seemed to realise that the finest orchestra in the world could not do its best under a shuttlecock scheme that was bound to be remakable for differences of tempi and of readings—but nobody seemed to care. All the public wanted was to see a different conductor's name at the head of the programme, and each newcomer was hailed as a novelty, and might be good, better, best; or bad, worse, worst—it made no difference, so long as he occupied the place assigned to the wielder of the baton. Not all of our 'guest-conductors' this season have achieved distinction, and perhaps the poorest of them all was Stravinsky. Certainly every one of his compositions that he conducted has been better done by our local conductors. Stravinsky is—or has been—the most interesting composer of modern times. What he is now—or will be in the future—is, as Kipling might say, 'another story.' 'L'Oiseau' is fascinating, and always has been; 'Le Chant du Rossignol' has great charm; 'Petrouchka' portrays the climax of his genius; and 'Le Sacre du Printemps,' though terrifying and overpowering, draws us irresistibly to repeated hearings. The great composer proved so unsatisfactory as a conductor that we can only be grateful that he did not attempt to direct his two masterpieces—or perhaps it would be more correct to say his one masterpiece, 'Petrouchka,' and the last flare of his genius 'Le Sacre du Printemps.' For his 'Octour,' and other later works which he calls 'pure music,' the present writer has no use whatever. Neither does the same listener wish again to hear his Pianoforte Concerto, which was heard at Paris last May, and gave little satisfaction as a composition and none at all as a performance. Wherever one places Stravinsky as a composer, it cannot be claimed by any intelligent listener that he is a pianist.

Of all the numerous 'guest-conductors' of the season only one name stands out prominently—that of Wilhelm Furtwängler. His history for the last ten years seems to have been that of a 'successor to' somebody. When Artur Bodanzky came to the Metropolitan, in 1915, Furtwängler succeeded him at Mannheim, and stayed there for five years. In 1920 he succeeded Richard Strauss as director of the symphony concerts of the Berlin State Opera Orchestra. In 1922 he succeeded Mengelberg at Frankfurt for a short time, thence going to Vienna as leader of the Friends of Music. The death of Nikisch in the same year made Furtwängler his successor at the Leipsic Gewandhaus and the Berlin Philharmonic. Furtwängler has made many appearances as 'guest-conductor' in cities of Germany and Austria, and his London début last year with the London Symphony Orchestra and the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra is a recent memory. With our Philharmonic he has certainly made good. None of the other guests with any of our orchestras has produced such a favourable impression on his audiences. He has not tried to exploit himself in any way, but simply to play the music of the great composers to the best of his ability—and his best reveals sound musicianship, deep understanding of the various composers' ideas, and a power of conveying to his men what he wants them to do. It is rumoured that Furtwängler will come back to us next winter for a longer stay. We hope that rumour will prove to be true.

A peculiar thing happened this season in the resignation of Stransky as leader of the State Symphony Orchestra in the middle of the season. He had for some time been interested in an art gallery, and suddenly he decided that pictures meant more to him than music—so he left the State Symphony to paddle its own canoe, and now devotes his time exclusively to works that demand solely the attention of his eyes and none at all of his ears. The State Symphony quickly engaged Ignatz Waghalter to finish the season. Better known in Germany, but as a composer, rather than a conductor, he is hardly known elsewhere in either capacity. Like many other German musicians who cannot find a job at home, he came to America last year and appeared in one concert. Afterwards he obtained the post of conductor of that extraordinary fiasco of German opera in English, attempted in Carnegie Hall last Fall, which began and ended with one performance of 'Rheingold.' Herr Waghalter did not conduct even that one, owing to the lack of funds which dogged the scheme.

What have all these conductors been doing lately? Mostly Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann, &c., with occasionally some crazy thing produced at one of the Composers' Guild concerts, or some stray weed like 'Hyperprism,' by Varese, which Stokowsky inflicted upon us totally without warrant.

Turning from the concert-halls to the Opera House, we are not confronted by anything startling to record. The revival of 'Dinorah' meant little except to lovers of coloratura, and to those who are so enamoured of Galli-Curci that they do not mind whether she is on the pitch or not. The revival of 'Götterdämmerung' was another matter. Along with the other German operas, it was taken out of the repertory when America went into the War, and it is the last (with the exception of 'Rheingold') to be restored. There is nothing to be said about the glorious splendour of the music, for it has all been said over and over again. The modernists can decry Wagner until they are speechless: it makes no difference. Wagner is immortal, and to dispute his supremacy is futile. Performances alone concern us, and prominent in these comes the conductor. When Bodanzky first came to America, in 1915, he made his début in 'Götterdämmerung.' It was a bold thing to do, but his success was as immediate as it was immense. His wonderful intelligence in the reading of the score, and the intensity of his interest in every bar of it, made the scene on the stage (as was also the case ten years ago) always of secondary interest. In this presentation of the opera Bohnen's Hagen was easily the star performance, Schorr's Gunther was also well done, Taucher's Siegfried called for no praise, Larsen-Todson in her début was a colourless Brünnhilde, Branzell sang very well as Waltraute, as also did the Norns and the Rhine Maidens, and not a moment of the five and a half hours was wearisome. Indeed, if the curtain had not been raised, if our eyes could have been fixed upon Bodanzky and our ears have heard nothing save the work of the men in the orchestral pit, a great surfeit of satisfaction would have filled our souls, and our one thought would have been, 'When will be the next performance of "Götterdämmerung"?'

TORONTO

There is a germ of satisfaction in a condition of affairs whereby the finest talent continues to visit a city despite an unbroken series of financial losses. The chamber music situation here is of this nature. During the past four weeks we have heard three very prominent organizations: the Huberman-Bauer-Tertis-Salmond, the Flonzaley and the London String Quartets. The Londoners were fortunate enough to be engaged by the National Chorus, and therefore enjoyed the first capacity house the ensemble has known at Toronto. The American combinations did not each draw more than six or seven hundred people. But the concerts took place, and artistically our musicians are the richer for the performances, especially for that of the Huberman group. Such individuality of temperament within a faultless unity of expression was a revelation to most of us, and served to illustrate to what extent present virtuosi excel the regular ensemble artists. Three works were given—two Pianoforte Quartets (the Mozart G minor and the Brahms G minor), a Beethoven Pianoforte Trio (the D major, Op. 70, No. 1) providing the most subtle contrasts in style, mood, and inspiration. The Flonzaleys played well, especially as regards variety of tonal colour, in the Haydn D minor, Op. 76, No. 2, and the Schubert D minor Quartets, and the Waldo Warner 'Pixie Ring' Suite. In works like the last-named we prefer the English sense of humour. The Londoners, playing between choral items, were recalled again and again after each of their numbers: Beethoven's Quartet in D major, Op. 18, No. 2, the Borodin 'Notturno,' Mendelssohn's Scherzo in E minor, Op. 44, and two Debussy movements, a Scherzo and an Andantino. As ever, their work was meticulously refined, and of the essence of musicianship.

Our home group, the Hart House String, excelled all previous accomplishments in two Beethoven Quartets, the A major, Op. 18, No. 5, and the massive E flat major, Op. 127; and the Hambourg Concert Society opened its series with a Dvorák Trio, the Beethoven C major Sonata, Op. 2 (played by Mr. Reginald Stewart), and the d'Erlanger 'Andante Symphonique' (played by Mr. Boris Hambourg).

The National Chorus, under Dr. Albert Ham, offered at its annual concert a varied and impressive selection of short part-songs, in which these singers afforded even more splendid evidence than in the past of their highly-trained beauty of voice and balance of tone. The programme contained 'All creatures now are merry-minded' (Benet), 'Like glad Cherubim in heav'nly chorus' (Glinka), 'Lullay my liking' (Holst), 'Oh, had I Jubal's lyre' (Handel); and, sung by the boys' choir, 'The Silent Land' (Faning), 'Bushes and Briars' and 'Just as the tide was flowing' (Vaughan Williams), 'Love is enough (Holst), 'The Blue Bird' (Stanford), and 'The Tempest' (Cornelius).

Mr. Alfred Heather obtained a well-merited success in a revival of 'The Beggar's Opera,' the score being specially arranged by Dr. Healey Willan, Miss Marjorie Vincent, as 'Polly' (she had been trained in England by Mr. Frederick Ranalow), both in singing and acting was faithful to the pure style of the English tradition, and Mr. Campbell McInnes made a somewhat staid but appealing Macheath.

The New Symphony Orchestra is giving itself up more wholeheartedly than ever to Mr. von Kunits's passion for Beethoven, with the result that a fine performance of the 'Leonora' Overture was heard at the sixth Twilight Concert, followed by an equally acceptable performance of Tchaikovsky's 'Romeo and Juliet' Overture at the seventh. The soloists at the two concerts were two violinists, Mr. Geza de Kresz in Beethoven's D major Concerto, Op. 61, and Mr. Arthur Hartman in the Saint-Saëns B minor, Op. 61.

Three well-attended vocal recitals were enjoyed from Mr. Roland Hayes, Mr. Vladimir Rosing, and Miss Evelyn Tierney, each excelling in well-balanced programmes selected according to their several distinct styles. The coloured tenor more than convinced his audience that he is one of the finest lyric artists this continent has ever known.

Other events included the Women's Musical Club afternoon recitals, with Mr. Max Schindler (violoncello) and Madame Dusseau (vocalist); Messrs. von Kunits and Frank Welsman in a sonata programme, including a new example by von Kunits in A minor; Mr. Ernest Seitz in one of his choice selections of Bach, Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin, Palmgren, Debussy, and Moszkowski; and the Toronto Ukranian Choir in an evening of national folk-songs.

It is worthy of mention that one of our motion picture houses has at last organized a full symphony orchestra, under the direction of Mr. John Arthur.

VIENNA

OPERATIC EVENTS

The Volksoper, although in a state of bankruptcy, yet manages to keep its doors open, with no financial backing whatever, and on the sole responsibility of its members. Remarkably, in this disorganized state, the theatre even succeeded in producing the long-announced first novelty of the season, Walter Braunfels's opera 'The Birds.' Based upon the grimly satirical comedy of Aristophanes, the work emphasises principally the romantic possibilities of the plot, its music laying stress upon pleasing melodies rather than accentuating dramatic tension. The singular feature of Braunfels's work lies in the fact that all but three of its characters are not human beings but birds, the humorous description of their fluttering, peeping, and skipping forming one of the attractive elements of the piece. Those who are prone to search for eclecticism in each new composition will doubtless find that Wagnerism rules almost throughout, alternating with reminiscences from Weber and Richard Strauss, the latter being particularly in evidence in the music allotted to the nightingale. The outstanding merit of Braunfels's score rests in the fact that he has written some grateful and beautiful parts for the soloists, and that the rôle of the nightingale, in particular, is as brilliant a coloratura part as may be found in any classical or modern work.

At the Staatsoper and elsewhere we note an attempt at a Mascagni renaissance, the Italian maestro having been present at the Opera to conduct his 'Cavalleria Rusticana,' and an ill-fated revival of his ever-unsuccessful 'Amico Fritz'; also personally promoting and directing the première of his operetta 'Yes,' at the Bürgertheater. The latter piece proved disappointing through Mascagni's inability to infuse it with the light and fluent melodies which make for real popularity. Its dramatic, or lyrical, scenes are burdened with a sentimentalism which renders them tiresome and dull.

NEW CHAMBER MUSIC

A rare occurrence even with the often temperamental musical public of Vienna was the reception accorded to the first performance of Paul Hindemith's 'Chamber Music No. 1,' which Rudolf Nilius presented with a chamber orchestra formed of Philharmonic players. The audience was moved almost to an uproar. The 'Chamber Music' is in four movements, of which the first is a short exposition with a literal recapitulation, the second a rhythmically strong piece, and the third allotted solely to three wood-wind instruments and glockenspiel. The last movement has for sub-title, '1921.' It is a grimly satirical fox-trot emerging from rushing, murmuring, brooding basses, which seem to suggest the unrest of a distorted period, and are finally relieved by the wild, boundless dance rhythm, a veritable danse macabre. The ironical significance of this music, which is nothing short of a portrait of its period, was lost upon the audience, and while the first movements evoked hisses and yells, the last number elicited an undue hilarity. With all its occasional offences against good taste, Hindemith's 'Chamber Music' is surely the work of a genius who momentarily lacks only some mental balance and falls short of maturity.

Tolstoi's 'Kreutzer' Sonata is the subject of Leos Janacek's new String Quartet, which the celebrated Bohemian String Quartet from Prague brought to a first hearing at Vienna. Janacek, whom many regard as the greatest creative genius of modern Czech music, is now over seventy years of age. Yet comparison of his new work with his earlier opera 'Jenufa'—which founded his fame eight years ago at Vienna, and which only recently has been heard at Berlin, New York, and elsewhere—discloses a growth and an advance hardly credible in a man of Janacek's age. The Quartet does not ask to be regarded as 'programme music,' and Tolstoi's novel is employed merely as an ingredient of its fundamental mood. It is a powerful and vigorous piece of music, and straightforward in its appeal, if not always fully transparent in its formal scheme.

RARE INSTRUMENTS

A noteworthy feature of recent weeks, musically, has been the appearances of a number of more than ordinarily interesting and gifted guitar players. The rôle of the guitar in the legitimate concert-hall is, as a rule, limited to its appearance as an instrument in the orchestral ensemble. It has remained for two remarkable Spanish virtuosi to make it a solo instrument to enlist the interest of the professional musician. The playing of Andres Segovia and Miguel Llobet was nothing short of a revelation, and exhibited a truly phenomenal mastery of the guitar. The vastly manifold orchestral shadings which these two men drew from their instrument was wonderful, and the compositions which modern composers like Granados and Albeñiz have written especially for the guitar were a great and agreeable surprise. A third newcomer in the guitar field was Louise Walker, a young Viennese girl, who, while not as yet equal in mastery to the two Spanish virtuosi, was pleasing to the eye and ear.

The double-bass is no less rare as a solo instrument in our time than is the guitar. Since Kussevitzky, the last of the great double-bass virtuosi, exchanged the bow for the baton, no other artist has coveted his laurels. This instrument is bound to remain a step-child in the family of solo instruments. It rarely rewards the pains expended upon it, and only the real master will find his attempts repaid. But Josef Prunner, an Austrian double-bass player domiciled at Bukarest, is a real master of his instrument; his technical agility, and the flexibility of his tone, were remarkable in Kussevitzky's Sonata, a grateful and moderately modern piece.

COMPOSITION CONCERTS

The species of 'composition concerts'—evenings devoted exclusively to the works of one composer—rank among the more interesting experiences to be encountered in the concert-hall. Often it is interesting to observe creative talent which, although bent not upon new and revolutionary tendencies but rather upon ideas and ideals of a former generation, seeks to form a connecting link between the classics and neo-classics and the music of to-day. An evening of this sort was that given by Leopold Welleba, who offered a Violin Concerto in E minor, and a number of songs, which, while bearing testimony for the reverence in which the composer holds his old-time master, Anton Bruckner, are yet not purely imitative or eclectic.

Another composition concert was that given by Karl Wiener, who was heard in a 'Cello Sonata and several works for violin and pianoforte and for pianoforte solo. Wiener is a victim of the war, with health severely and permanently impaired, and quite naturally his music breathes an atmosphere of melancholy and resignation. His pianoforte playing, excellent in itself and a manifestation of concentrated energy, represents a triumph of mind over matter, and is eloquent of spiritual uplift over bodily suffering.

Quite a different note speaks in the music of Count Adam Teleki, a young Hungarian nobleman who presented a number of his songs and provided a remarkably polished accompaniment at the pianoforte. His music is a blend of many styles, ranging from Brahms to Strauss, with occasional bows to Puccini's lyricism, but it gives promise of good development under strict and severe guidance.

Alexander Tcherepnin, a young Russian composer domiciled at Paris, also appeared in the double capacity of composer and pianist. The latter rôle suffered under an uneven technical equipment, but his compositions evinced a keen sense of the possibilities and resources of his instrument. Brilliant and effective pieces, along the lines of Rachmaninov's pianistic output, the more remarkable among them were a Sonata in A minor, a 'Small Suite,' two Toccatas, and a number of clever transcriptions of Russian folk-songs.

SOLOISTS

Three new violoncellists have attracted attention here recently. The first was Maurits Frank, a Dutchman, formerly connected with the Amar-Hindemith Quartet, who represents the modern and intellectual type—the artist who steps modestly behind the composer's work. His antipode is Gaspar Cassado, a young Spaniard, who is a pure virtuoso, albeit one of the first order, gifted with a tone of remarkable beauty and pliability. The third in the series, Mildred Wellerson, is a very young American girl, who baffled her hearers by her truly tremendous technique. Her tone is small and none too sonorous, and her interpretation not fully balanced, but she has the true virtuoso style for show pieces such as Popper's Hungarian Rhapsody.

The latest addition to the ranks of musical child prodigies, and the first to covet the laurels of a coloratura star, is Helen Markus-Szoyer, a Hungarian girl but nine years of age. Her staccato technique is phenomenal, and her musicality beyond her years, but on the whole her début in public was premature owing to the physical and mental deficiencies inseparable from youth.

Katherine Goodson, a musical product of Vienna through her apprenticeship under the late Theodore Leschetizky, returned to Vienna after a long interval and made a signal and highly deserved success. Her reading of Brahms's D minor Concerto, under Franz Schalk, and her performances of the Schumann C major Fantasy, at her recital, were experiences not soon to be forgotten. Her wonderfully sympathetic playing of the pianoforte part in Brahms's F minor Quintet, with the Buxbaum Quartet, gave ample proof of her great versatility. Above and beyond the grandeur of her conceptions, and of a flawless technique, Miss Goodson possesses the secret of making the pianoforte a living, breathing entity through the warmth and depth of her lyrical effects.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

FREDERICK JOHN READ, on January 28, at Chichester, in his sixty-eighth year. He was born at Faversham, and was a pupil of Corfe and Bridge. His first organ post of importance was at Reading, where he founded a choral society of which he remained conductor for some years after his other connections with the town ceased. He was appointed to Chichester Cathedral in 1887, resigning the post in 1902 in order to live in London for the sake of his work at the Royal College of Music. He did much examining for the Associated Board, for musical degrees at Oxford, and at London University, and was a member of the Council and an examiner at the Royal College of Organists. On the resignation of Mr. F. J. W. Crowe, in 1921, he was re-appointed to the Chichester Cathedral organistship. He died in harness, playing at the Cathedral on the Sunday preceding the Tuesday on which his death took place, and conducting a rehearsal of Chichester Musical Society on the Monday evening.

Sir Hugh Allen writes:

'As the oldest of Dr. F. J. Read's many pupils, I should like to place on record the gratitude we feel for the example, stimulus, and help he gave us in those early days. As a boy of seven I remember Read, then a young man of nineteen, just fresh from his Oxford examination for Bachelor of Music, as organist of Christ Church, Reading, and I can still feel the thrill which his playing gave me—the first of my musical experiences—and the spell which this young, smart, and attractive musician cast over me. I was determined to go to him when old enough to learn music.

'He came as a light to a benighted city, for Reading had very little musical life in those days, and in a few years he had the whole place at his beck and call. The services at Christ Church were easily the best in the town, and Read's organ playing, which had all the neatness and musical qualities of the Parratt school, became a centre of attraction.

'When Read went to Chichester as organist of the Cathedral, in 1886, he was kind enough to ask me to become his assistant there, and during three or four years of the dearest and happiest friendship I learned more and more to admire him for the way in which he tackled the problems of this Cathedral music, for the high standard that he set himself in all performances, and for the fine success he achieved. One of his first and most striking initiations was the singing of the "St. Matthew" Passion music, spread over the six days of Holy Week. I shall never forget this performance, firstly because of its charming simplicity, and secondly because it was the first time I had ever heard the work. He also introduced to Chichester the "Christmas" Oratorio.

'As conductor of Chichester Musical Society, Read did many well-known works, among which was one of the earliest performances of Parry's "Job," and on a smaller scale he saw to it that the best spirit of madrigal singing was kept alive, some of the concerts in this direction being notable.

'During the whole period of his Chichester appointment, Dr. Read was a Professor at the Royal College of Music for Paper Work, and for a considerable part of the time was in charge of the Music Classes. Many of our most distinguished young musicians have passed through his hands and can testify to the enlightened and fatherly interest he had in them.'

'In his early days, Read bid fair to become a composer. Two of his works won prizes—the anthem, "Let my complaint," and the madrigal, "Love wakes and weeps," which was awarded the Madrigal Society's prize. He composed two or three minor works, either for Reading Orpheus Society, which he founded, or for the Eaglesfield Society at Oxford, and a considerable amount of church music, including the "Song of Hannah."

'Throughout his life Read made his influence felt in many directions. His insistence on every detail of the music he was responsible for, and his love of accuracy, made him a splendid master. The pupils who lived and worked with him learned many lessons which have been invaluable to them. They learned not only to respect him for his musicianly qualities, but to love him as a friend. Read gave much time and thought to the problems of the Royal College of Organists, and was an examiner for that institution for many years. He also examined for musical degrees at Oxford and London. As a member of the examining staff of the Associated Board he was widely known and universally respected. He was a musician of the older school, but his thoroughness and insistence made his influence really effective. His choirs at Reading and Chichester adored him. His choral societies set a real store by his teaching and leading. It was indeed an appropriate and touching thing that the final rehearsal for a concert of his beloved musical society at Chichester should have been his last work in a long and distinguished service to music.'

XAVER SCHARWENKA, who died in December, 1924, at the age of seventy-four. He was universally considered one of the leading pianists of his time. His tone, it is said, was beautiful and his interpretations in every school of pianoforte music were those of a musician. As a composer he won prominence with his four Concertos, and his opera 'Mataswintha,' but the public knew him by his 'Polish Dances,' which could be described as the C sharp minor Prelude of their day. To pianoforte students his name is everywhere familiar on the covers of 'editions' and books of studies.

FREDERICK KNIGHT COULDREY, at Abingdon, on December 29. Born in 1847, he was one of five brothers all of whom were musicians (one, the late H. R. Couldrey, was assistant music master at Eton). He occupied the post of organist at St. Helen's Parish Church, Abingdon, for sixty years. As his grandfather, whom he succeeded, had filled the same office for fifty years, a very remarkable family record was set up.

We have given a trial to the 'Simplexa Pocket Finger Trainer,' and have no hesitation in recommending it to our readers as a means of stretching the fingers and keeping them generally in good playing condition. Instrumentalists who are travelling, or unable to obtain regular practice, will find the appliance a boon. It is well-named, being simplicity itself, and so portable that it can be carried in the waistcoat pocket.

Answers to Correspondents

Questions must be of general musical interest. They must be stated simply and briefly, and if several are sent, each must be written on a separate slip. We cannot undertake to reply by post.

T. S. M.—(1.) We could give you more definite advice if you had told us how far you are advanced in your technical studies. All violin methods devote some exercises to bowing. The second study of Kreutzer alone offers an enormous field. Most editions give some twenty variations, and you can work out others yourself by ringing the changes on the theme :

and applying them to whatever you find specially difficult. Thus if you aim at staccato you turn the semiquavers into :

Tartini's 'Fifty Variations on a Gavotte' are really a set of exercises excellent for both left hand and right arm. But they presuppose a fair degree of technical skill. Meerts's 'Le Mécanisme de l'Archet' is easier for the left hand and pretty thorough. If you require commentary you will find copious notes in Casorti's 'Bogentechnik,' which is fairly easy for the left hand. This is very good as far as it goes, and advisable if you wish to make sure of the foundations of bowing. Spohr's 'Violin Studies' do not pretend to specialise on bowing, but since Spohr was one of the great masters of bowing, the studies deal indirectly with much that is essentially the technique of the bow. These demand a fair standard of left-hand technique. Bowing studies are to be found in all complete methods. If you are a patient man and of bull-dog tenacity you cannot do better than turn to the four thousand Bogenstrichübungen of Sevcik, published by Bosworth in three volumes, of which the first consists of exercises in detached and springing bow ; the second book is devoted to developing the suppleness of the wrist ; and the third book is meant to give it strength. If the time at your disposal is limited, or your temperament somewhat hasty, try the third part of Schradieck's 'Violin School' (seventeen Studies) which is concerned with bowing exclusively. This was one of the text-books used at Leipsic. You ask that the method should be 'up to date.' We know no more about bowing than was known to Tartini. (2.) The choice of a violin is not an easy thing to advise upon. You ought to get all you want for £40. Old Italian instruments of unknown parentage can be had sometimes for that price, and, if you are fortunate, you may be able to find a good English violin costing no more. We can, however, give you some negative advice :

(1.) Do not believe that you can get a bargain without expert advice ;

(2.) Do not trust to labels ;

(3.) A reputable dealer will make his profit, but he also gives you the benefit of his experience and authority.

R. C. D.—The book you mention is very lively and readable ; as a piece of critical writing, however, it shows a want of balance. See our review of it in the December Musical Times. There is no really comprehensive book on modern composers, so far as we know. A good many excellent articles on individual composers have, however, appeared in the musical press during the past few years, and we think your best plan would be to consult such of these as deal with any composers you are specially interested in. (Back numbers can usually be had on application to the publishers.) In 1919-20, Edwin Evans wrote an admirable series on British composers for the Musical Times as follows: Frank Bridge (February), Arnold Bax (March and April), Benjamin Dale (May), Eugène Goossens (June and July), John Ireland (August and September), Gustav Holst (October, November, and December), 1919 ; Lord Berners (January), Herbert Howells (February and March), Ralph Vaughan Williams (April, May, and June), 1920. Of the young Italian school the following were discussed in 1921 by Guido M. Gatti : Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco (February), Franco Alfano (March), Victor de Sabata (April), Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli (May), Vincenzo Davico (June), Alfredo Casella (July), Vittorio Gui (October), Vincenzo Tommasini (November), and the December issue contained brief notes on Respighi, Alaleona, Gasco, Luizzi, Pratella, Perrachio, Pizzetti, Santoliquido, and Coppola. Other articles of the kind were by Philip Heseltine—Béla Bartók, Zoltán Kodály, and Laszlo Laïtha (March, 1922) ; by Edwin Evans—Arthur Bliss (January and February, 1923) ; and by Alfred J. Swan—Roger-Ducasse (April, 1921). With such a list as this—it is not complete—who can say that the Musical Times ignores contemporary music ?

A. H. W.—(1.) The books you have are (as you put it) 'alright,' which is more than can be said of the word itself ! Add to them Kitson's 'Harmony' (Oxford University Press) and Ham's 'Outlines of Musical Form' (Novello). But you can hardly teach yourself composition by books alone. Supplement them by careful examination and analysis of good music of all kinds. In order to write chamber music you must do a lot more than 'hear a good deal of it in order to get inspired in that line.' You must know something of the technique, possibilities, and limitations of the instrument. You say you write songs. Do you know anything about singing ? If not, stop writing for the voice until you do. (2.) 'When a composer has written a good bass to a good melody, how does he fill in the other parts ?' There are a hundred ways of doing it, and his choice will depend on the character of the song. This is a difficult branch of composition, and obviously calls for some knowledge of pianoforte technique and idiom. Study lots of the best models, from Schubert to present-day composers. Your own efforts should begin with plain four-part harmony, which you should lay out in a variety of ways—repeated chords, broken ditto, simple arpeggios, more extended ditto, ornamentation, &c. But don't be afraid of being simple ; modern songs more often fail through want of simplicity. Remember Brahms's rough-and-ready way of sizing up a song : he used to cover up the right-hand part and leave exposed only the voice-part and the bass of the accompaniment. Get these right, and you can afford to be very modest with the remainder. But feebleness in one or both can never be saved by twiddley-bits. (3.) We will bear in mind your suggestion for an occasional article on composition.

M. H. H.—It is not easy to advise a course of study by means of which a young man in the Navy can learn the rudiments of harmony 'and the use of the keyboard to some extent without the presence of the latter, to be applied whenever opportunity occurs.' In the matter of rudiments, of course, a keen and apt student can teach himself much ; but keyboard technique obviously calls for a keyboard, and even for a teacher. Are you sure there will be no keyboard instrument on board ? We should imagine there would be at least a harmonium or American organ for use at church muster. If there is, he should get all the practice he can, playing any music that may be within reach, from dance music to hymn-tunes—especially the latter. If he comes ashore able to do no more than play hymn-tunes, legato, with all the four parts clear, he will have acquired a useful bit of technical foundation—a bit that many pianists somehow miss, as is seen when they are called on to play simple polyphony. Your young mariner can do much to keep his fingers in good trim by means of thoughtfully-executed gymnastics, and with the aid of the 'Techniquer,' or the 'Simplexa Finger Trainer.' Personally we have found the exercises described in Ridley Prentice's 'Hand Gymnastics' (Novello, 2*s.* 6*d.*) very useful. For the rudiments he might take O'Neill's 'Theory of Music' (Novello, 1*s.* 6*d.*), and for self-study of the pianoforte Pauer's 'The Pianoforte' (Novello, 3*s.*). But almost everything depends on his power of applying himself, and of making the very utmost of such rare opportunities for practice and tuition as come his way.

LENT.—Without hearing your choir sing its Palestrina and Vittoria we cannot very well advise you 'how to improve the style and rhythm.' In regard to the former we can only say that the main essentials are purity and simplicity, with (generally speaking) an avoidance of extreme dynamic contrasts. Obviously the vocal quality must be good, or there will not be the pure chording and blend which are essential in a cappella singing. The rhythm should be of the phrase, not of the bar. Get your verbal accentuation right (without underlining, of course), and you cannot go far astray. When you have worked on these lines for a bit, the music ought to 'sound right.' If it doesn't, there is some other fault which will require to be diagnosed. For example, avoid (a) too loud a scale of power, and (b) so uniformly quiet a scale that the result lacks vitality. The aim should be the achievement of subtle shades of power in a rather restricted area—say between mf and p.

A. C.—We do not care to give lists of songs. Such a list may be impeccable in quality, and yet contain not one that suits your voice, or that hits your taste. The choice is for you and your teacher, and if your teacher is a foreigner, who (as you say) 'does not seem to know much about this side of English music,' it is about time that he did. While he is completing this important part of a singing-teacher's education, you must help yourself by going to various music publishers, and examining songs of the type you want. In addition, you should study the reviews and advertisements in the musical press. We don't know how long you have been a reader of the Musical Times, but if you had read its reviews of new songs for only a few months, you would find out a good deal of what you want to know. And of course there are plenty of vocal recitals which you should attend, in order to learn how and what to sing—or sometimes how not and what not.

INQUIRER.—We cannot choose your lecture subject. Take any one about which you yourself are keen and well-informed (or willing to dig up ample information), and which you may reasonably suppose your audience is thirsting to hear discussed. To deal with Beethoven, as you suggest, you must be prepared to provide ample musical illustrations. He is a subject for a course of lectures, rather than for one. You might, however, in one well-planned evening, take a single aspect of his life and work—pianoforte sonatas, chamber music, methods (sketch-books), &c. But the subject and method of treatment must depend on the nature of your audience.

INQUIRER.—The scheme of pace you use for Franck's Final strikes us as being effective, but of course much depends on the way the varying speeds are graded and joined up. We agree that changes, though not marked by Franck, seem to be necessary. The opening is just as clearly four in a bar as the second subject appears to be two in a bar. The trouble is to make them so without destroying the unity of the piece. The only point we venture to question is that rubato at the close. We like the whole of the last page at a brilliant pace and in strict time.

AMATEUR.—Haydn, 'A Croation Composer,' Hadow; 'Mozart,' Holmes (Everyman Library); 'Beethoven and his Forerunners,' Mason; 'Beethoven,' Chantavoine (Alkan, Paris; and Novello; this book is in French); 'Brahms,' Fuller-Maitland (Methuen), and 'Brahms,' Colles. We are not sure of publishers and prices in some cases. You can obtain them through Novello. Some of the books are known to us by titles only, but we have heard them well spoken of. (We are glad you find our columns useful and interesting.)

QUATTUOR.—Your best plan will be to obtain from Novello's a supply on approval of part-songs for S.A.T.B., and choose from these a few that lend themselves to use as quartets. A great deal of simple choral music is suitable, but you will naturally avoid (1) such as call for extreme high or low notes (unless your quartet is blessed with voices of big compass); (2) any that contain passages that obviously depend on power or fullness for their effect; and (3) those in which any of the parts divide at times.

V. W. A.—In Geoffrey Shaw's 'Worship' the crotchet is the unit throughout. The paces you mention should serve. We should make the return to the a tempo at the beginning of the note C on second syllable of 'temple,' because the pianoforte part re-enters at that point, and the voices come in two beats later. You have thus less than a bar in which to make the tempo clear to the singers. If you delay the a tempo you will risk a weak lead of contraltos and basses.

A. W. H. T.—J. F. Bridge's 'Songs from Shakespeare' (Novello) contains the earliest known settings of the songs in the plays, and includes Morley's 'O mistress mine.' Good modern settings of the 'Twelfth Night' songs are by Stanford ('O mistress mine,' 'Come away, Death,' and 'When that I was'), published by Boosey; Sullivan's 'O mistress mine' (Metzler); and Quilter's 'O mistress mine' and 'Come away, Death' (Boosey).

T. O'N. (CORK).—Ask us another! Nobody can say how long it will take you 'to learn the violin by music, and how much a lesson for same.' So much depends on whether you start with the advantage of a good general knowledge of musical elements, ability to play (say) the pianoforte, and so on. As to 'how much a lesson for same,' remember that low-priced lessons will probably be dearest in the long run.

A. M. H.—We know of no other books on accompaniment than those you mention. Have you read the article by Hubert J. Foss (Musical Times, November and December, 1924)? Orchestral effects may be indicated in the way you suggest, but you appear to overlook the possibilities of variety of tone. Much may be done in this way, as well as by the differences of touch you describe.

P. E. S.—The majority of important choral works can be hired from Novello. The purchase of second-hand copies is liable to lead to difficulties, as most modern works of the kind cannot be performed publicly without the permission of the publishers. This permission usually goes with the hire or purchase of copies from the publishers.

W. H. G.—Hofmann's book on instrumentation was published in an English translation by Robin H. Legge (Augener). It is in seven parts, and the price of the complete work is about 50*s*. There is, of course, a copy at the British Museum which may be consulted by students in the ordinary way.

CANADIAN.—(1.) 'Score-Reading Exercises,' by Emily R. Daymond, in two books (Book 1, with C clefs for E.R.C.O. work; Book 2, with G clefs, for A.R.C.O.); 'Score-Reading Exercises,' by Arthur H. Peppin (preparatory to Dr. Daymond's book). (2.) 'Transposition,' by J. Warriner (all published by Novello).

R. J. R.—For the 'conductors and concert-givers' we advised you to approach, consult Rudall Carte's Directory. Begin with well-known musicians in your district who give choral and other concerts. Get in touch with as many conductors of suburban and London choral societies as you can persuade to grant you an interview or a hearing.

L. T. L. D.—There is no American periodical corresponding with the English quarterly, The Organ. You will find a good deal of interesting news in The Diapason (1507, Kimball Buildings, Chicago) and the American Organist (467, City Hall Station, New York).

W. L. S.—(1.) A long article on Elgar's second Symphony, by Ernest Newman, appeared in the Musical Times for May, 1911. (2.) Try Holmes's 'Life of Mozart' (Everyman Library), and Dent's 'Mozart and the Opera' (Chatto & Windus, 12*s*. 6*d*.).

M. H. P.—The question of copyright has been dealt with in these columns so fully that we cannot go into it again. See Musical Times for August, 1924. We cannot undertake to answer queries by post.

TWENTY YEARS A SUBSCRIBER.—We cannot here recommend any particular type of gramophone, but you ought to be well suited by paying anything from fifteen guineas upwards. Go to a good dealer and inspect some.

RETLAW.—We know of no forthcoming performances in the London district of Graun's 'Passion.' If any reader can tell us of any, we will forward the information to you direct.

FIDDLER.—Apply for particulars of scholarships at the R.A.M., R.C.M., G.S.M., and Trinity College. The Rivarde School of Violin playing offers three scholarships, for one of which your son would be eligible. Write to the Secretary, Miss Agnes Skally, 1a, Cheniston Gardens, W.8.

M. G. M.—You had better write to the respective publishers before embarking on any re-scoring of orchestral music.

ELMUS.—Yes, the Higgs book on 'Fugue' is good. For urther study of this subject, try Prout's 'Fugal Analysis' (Augener).

Miscellaneous

In reference to the strictures of our reviewer 'C' on English versions of 'Carmen' (Musical Times, February, p. 132), a reader points out that there is an excellent translation by Mr. Herman Klein, published by Metzler. It was introduced at Covent Garden some years ago by the Raymond Rosé Company, and warmly praised.

From the Oxford Press comes an annual now in its twenty-eighth year of issue—the 'Kalendar of Hymns Ancient and Modern and the English Hymnal for 1925'—an invaluable guide to the choice of hymns.

PART-SONGS OF POPULAR APPEAL

S.A.T.B.

In these works the publishers have hit upon the unique idea of arranging famous compositions as part-songs for mixed voices. The adaptations of the familiar melodies for part-song purposes are remarkably successful, and will undoubtedly find favour with choristers on the look out for popular material.

OLD ENGLISH

VIOLIN MUSIC

EDITED BY

ALFRED MOFFAT.

PREFATORY NOTE.

Although considerable attention has been given to the resuscitation of Church Music, Glees and Madrigals, Organ and even Harpsichord Music by the older English composers, very little has been done to make known the large mass of music for the Violin written by English musicians from the time of Purcell to the close of the 18th century. These works for the most part consist of Suites or Sonatas written for a solo violin with a figured bass, or for two violins and violoncello with a figured bass for the harpsichord or organ; another favourite form was the Concerto grosso.

It is with the object of making known to the public a selection of the best of these compositions that the present series has been undertaken.

ALFRED MOFFAT.

XII.—EURHYTHMICS.—THE PRACTICE OF EURHYTHMICS.

"It was very much wanted, and now that it has arrived it proves to be the best book on the subject we have ever seen. . . . One would like to dwell lovingly on every stage of this monumental work did space permit, but it will only allow of a general commendation of every word from the beginning . . . to the end, which consists of music to accompany the rhythmic physical exercises."—The Morning Post, February 17, 1922.

"No teacher of singing should be without this wonderful book."—Musical Opinion.

"This is a thoughtful and thought-compelling book which touches life at most points. Eurhythm the author defines as perfect harmony, and discusses with a fine enthusiasm the practical means of bringing about in the individual this desirable condition. The book should be of great value to teachers of singing and physical education, while the intelligent student can also derive great benefit from a careful reading."—Glasgow Herald.

How To Play Difficult Music With Ease.

PIANISTS who wish to play the music which affords the greatest enjoyment and relaxation—the compositions of the world's greatest musicians—and who are adverse to the drudgery of wearisome keyboard practising in order to obtain the necessary technical proficiency, will find the "Brain to Keyboard" method of the greatest possible help.

Practice on this System, much of it away from the keyboard, is never wearisome; and after some weeks of it, spending quite a short time every day, a degree of technical proficiency is obtained which would be otherwise impossible, even after years of keyboard practising for several hours daily.

Many eminent musicians, including the late Sir Frederick Bridge, have used and highly recommended my System—the ORIGINAL POSTAL SYSTEM. More than 18,000 Successful Students of all ages add their testimony.

"From Brain to Keyboard"

Macdonald Smith's System of Pianoforte Playing.

My illustrated book, "Light on Pianoforte Playing," will gladly be sent to any pianist. It fully explains the principles and advantages of the methods used in the System. When applying, please state whether comparative beginner, average, or advanced pianist. The book will be sent free of charge, and post free.

THE TECHNIQUER

FOR STRETCH, STRENGTH, AND SUPPLENESS.

CARL WEBER, the renowned teacher says:

"After a trial, I find 'The Techniquer' an admirable means of lessening the drudgery of a pianist's daily gymnastics. The exercises have the effect of strengthening the fingers to a remarkable degree, the result being that confidence and power are greatly increased, while effort is reduced and time saved. I recommend your excellent invention wherever I can, and with every confidence."

PUPILS PREPARED FOR A.R.C.M. AND L.R.A.M. EXAMS.

"Mr. Garcia—himself a fine artist and the inheritor of a great tradition and a great name—has some most promising pupils. It was particularly pleasant to hear voices, so well placed and well poised, smooth and even in tone, from the lowest to the highest notes, showing a control which too few learn to exercise."—Daily Telegraph.

MANUEL GARCIA'S "ART OF SINGING" has recently been edited and revised from the original edition by ALBERT GARCIA.

Publishers: Messrs. LEONARD & Co., 47, Poland Street, W.1 Price 6*s.*

"A work that should be of interest to all singers, young or old, is Albert Garcia's newly-published edition of his grandfather's 'Art of Singing.' There are many famous cases of inherited talents in the arts, but not many where the same branch of the profession has been followed by successive generations, and the case of the Garcias is probably unique."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. Albert Garcia, who comes of a famous line of singing teachers, has re-edited the treatise of the great Garcia, his grand father—the admirable old man who departed only recently (in 1906), after more than half a century of eminent educational labours in London. The value of the book, with its exercises and the various bits of traditional lore which it contains, is considerable."—Morning Post.

"Garcia's Treatise has stood the test of time so well that a new edition needs little more than mention. The revision has been done by the author's grandson. Looking at these large pages of exercises corresponding to the purely technical studies of the pianist, one sees through the secret of the permanent results of the old thorough-going methods of training."—Musical Times.

"In its present form it is one of the most practical and valuable treatises on the art extant."—Birmingham Weekly Post.

"Garcia's 'Art of Singing.' This well-known treatise, by one of the most famous teachers of singing, is issued in a revised edition by the grandson of the great Manuel Garcia. It is a complete theoretical and practical guide to the art of singing."—Liverpool Post.

LET ME HELP YOU WITH YOUR PIANO STUDIES and TEACHING

HIGHER MARKS AT EXAMINATIONS.

An Organist writes: "I was struck with the increase of marks gained. I certainly think the better results came entirely from the fact that I adopted as many of the principles of your method as possible."

100 PER CENT. BETTER TECHNIQUE.

A Pianist writes: "It is no exaggeration for me to say that I have improved a HUNDRED PER CENT., and my technique is still steadily improving from day to day."

THE REAL USE OF RELAXATION.

L.R.A.M., A.R.C.M. writes: "For years I have studied the ART OF RELAXATION, but never seemed to get the fullest results. I feel now, through your help, I have solved the problem."

HERE IS YOUR PROOF that the Mackinnon Memory Course can Teach YOU to Memorise.

"February, 1925.

"Lately I have been able to put the Mackinnon Memory Course to a severe test, having played eleven times in the last fortnight—some of the Concerts being real ordeals. Thanks to you and your excellent and sound system, from always having been unpleasantly nervous on account of my memory, I played long programmes with comfort and assurance.

"Your knowledge of psychology is amazing, and I should like to thank you for it, and for the very real help you must offer to so many who, like myself, are liable to be overcome by one's limitations instead of overcoming them.

"May I tell you how more than grateful I am to you.

"Yours sincerely,

"_____."

Just as the MACKINNON MEMORY COURSE taught the writer of this letter to play from memory without nervousness—so it will teach you.

In SIX SIMPLE CORRESPONDENCE LESSONS the Mackinnon Course trains and develops your memory so that you can memorise any music with ease.

Previous failure is of no importance. Age is no disadvantage. The Mackinnon Course has been equally successful with pianists of from seventeen to seventy!

The Mackinnon Memory Course is above all practical, from the very first lesson you begin to form a répertoire of brilliant music. No knowledge of harmony is necessary. Only fifteen minutes' daily practice is required. Teachers and Students can easily fit in the course with their regular work. Send coupon below for free booklet giving full details and numerous testimonials to-day.

PIANO PEDALS, with Octave Coupler

This wonderful invention supersedes all Piano Pedals, and is a Master Patent.
St. George's Hall, Liverpool,
9th April, 1921.

"The simplicity of the attachment, and the clever sixteen-feet, eight-feet, or both combined, 'OPTIONAL OCTAVE' contrivance, astonished me.

"I was delighted with the Pedal touch and with the variety in that touch, which your Attachment makes possible. It is very responsive to the movements of the feet, and is reliable."

Follow the Lead of the Master Musicians

PECSKAI
The famous violinist of the London Trio, says: "I congratulate you on the 'Cathedral' Strings. They are the very best A and D Strings I have had during the 35 years of my career. They are even superior to the splendid old Ruffinis of 27 years ago."

DE GROOT
The versatile and popular leader and director of the orchestra at the Piccadilly Hotel, says: "I have used 'Cathedral' Gut Strings and also your Steel E Strings with the greatest satisfaction. I have found them of valuable assistance, especially in recording and broadcasting."

There's a very good reason why the leading Virtuosi of the day are now using "CATHEDRAL" Strings. It is due to "Quality." "CATHEDRAL" Strings assist inspiration and interpretation. If it were otherwise the men whose names appear here would be using some other strings. Read the testimonials in this announcement very carefully. These letters justify our claim that "CATHEDRAL" Strings are made for the critical musician. There is nothing like them—either in finish or in Quality. They satisfy because they make musical expression easier, and characteristic of the artist. Every "CATHEDRAL" String is guaranteed, and every Music Dealer is authorised to exchange free any string that does not give the most critical instrumentalist entire satisfaction.

Of the celebrated London Trio, pays the following remarkable tribute to the "Arthur Broadley" Cathedral 'Cello Strings: "I feel I should like to express my satisfaction with the Strings. I put an A on my Ruggerius two days before our last London Trio concert, and I was astonished at the improvement in the tone—both as to brilliance and depth."

JOHN DUNN
The doyen of the great English Violinists, says: "'Cathedral' Strings are excellent in every respect." This is high praise coming from a player who takes such care in the choice of his strings. "Cathedral" Strings are made for the critical musician. There is nothing like them in finish or in quality.

MELSA
The famous violinist, who accompanied Dame Clara Butt on her Australian tour, sends the following testimonial to "Cathedral" Strings: "I find your smooth A and D 'Cathedral' Strings most excellent, and I would recommend them as being equal to any other English or foreign Strings."

ARTHUR BROADLEY
Professor of the Violoncello of 30 years' standing, writes: "The 'Cathedral' 'Cello Strings are of just the right texture and degree of roughness. The Gut is of beautiful quality, clear and transparent, and the spinning has been done with a skilled hand. I have them on my old Italian instruments, and in spite of dreadful weather, I have never produced a single squeak."

THE PILGRIM'S PROGRESS

NARRATIVE TONE-POEM FOR ORGAN.

ERNEST AUSTIN.

IN view of the fact that a musical version by an American composer of "The Pilgrim's Progress" has been recently broadcast throughout the British Isles, I wish to call the attention of English Organists to a version by one of their own countrymen, which deserves their attention and interest. I refer to Mr. Ernest Austin's Narrative-Poem for Organ, "The Pilgrim's Progress," in Twelve Parts—which I publish.

In spite of the Composer's activity in other branches of composition, this work of his is destined to be regarded as a remarkable and beautiful contribution to English Music. Performances in America, Canada, South Africa, and New Zealand are from time to time brought to my notice; and the first entire performances of the work in America and Canada were occasions of unusual public interest.

In the British Isles the work has been presented to the public by relatively only a few organists; but they have been men who were prepared to find, follow, and express the musical vision contained in the work. It may be that the times are out of joint for the appreciation of a work of this kind, but it is strange to me—as a Publisher—to note the relatively scant attention doled out to composers who give always of their best.

Some idea of the scope of Ernest Austin's work may be gathered from the fact that it is in Twelve distinct Parts, occupying 264 pages of engraved music. It is cast in form, so that each Part forms a complete musical section; the entire work being linked up by a series of motives that constantly undergo dramatic change.

[An American paper in commenting upon Mr. Ernest Austin's work, referred ironically to the fact that it was so dramatically conceived that apart from its proper environment it should be in the répertoire of every Picture House in the States.]

Almost every organist who becomes interested in this Narrative-Poem, ends up by giving the entire work—spread over three or four Recitals. The final—the 12th—Part offers opportunity for optional Choir, Bells, and Violin solo. I shall be glad to forward, on request, a copy of an appreciative analysis of the work by Ambrose P. Porter, Mus. Bac., F.R.C.O.

Synopsis of the work is as follows:

PART I.
PILGRIM'S UNHAPPINESS.

PART II.
PILGRIM AND HIS CRITICS.

PART III.
PILGRIM WANDERING IN THE FIELDS, MEETS EVANGELIST AND BEGINS HIS JOURNEY.

PART IV.
PILGRIM AT THE HOUSE OF THE INTERPRETER, AND BY THE CROSS.

THE "DISCUS" ORGAN BLOWER

Is installed and giving complete satisfaction in over a thousand Cathedrals, Churches, Theatres, and Cinemas in Great Britain alone. This fact is eloquent, as well as convincing testimony, to its efficiency and durability. It is the most satisfactory method of mechanical organ blowing, and as the motive power may be oil, gas, or electric motor, the "Discus" is suitable for churches in any locality. The application of a "Discus" equipment to an organ ensures a steady supply of wind being instantly available, and enables the organist to obtain the best possible effects from the instrument. The "Discus" blower is the most scientifically designed machine for organ blowing purposes on the market. It is made of metal throughout, of the best quality combined with high grade workmanship. Being entirely free of complicated mechanism, a minimum of attention is required, and very many years of satisfactory services ensured. Efficiency and reliability are fully guaranteed with each "Discus" equipment we instal.

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR

(FOR LIST OF CONTENTS SEE PAGE 366.)

A strike of bookbinders caused the Musical Times for April to be sent to press, at short notice, several days earlier than usual. The indulgence of readers is therefore asked for the omission of a good many news items, some answers to correspondents, and certain regular features. So far as is practicable, the held-over matter will appear in the May issue.

'AT THE BOAR'S HEAD': HOLST'S NEW WORK.*

BY HARVEY GRACE

Seeing that Falstaff is, as Mr. Masefield says, 'the most notable figure in English comedy,' one would have expected our composers to have tumbled over one another in their eagerness to write an opera round him. That they have not done so is probably due to the fact that comic opera, in an even greater degree than the serious sort, has little to do with human nature. Its concern is rather with amusing incidents and situations brought about by the traffic of characters either fantastic or purely conventional. A really great example of a figure at once comic and human scarcely exists in opera, although the type abounds in drama proper. Apparently both librettists and composers have fought shy of such a prodigy. Most of them would have been overwhelmed by Falstaff—the real one, that is—the Falstaff of Henry IV. The fat man of the same name in the 'Merry Wives of Windsor' is (if the figure may be allowed) a shadow in comparison—a mere butt, to be laughed at rather than with. Perhaps Verdi felt something of this inadequacy; at all events, he helps out the hero of his 'Falstaff' (although the story is that of the 'Merry Wives of Windsor') by drawing on 'Henry IV.' for some Falstaff passages. Nicolai's opera is familiar, at least by name, and through its Overture; but does anybody to-day know anything of Balfe's 'Merry Wives of Windsor'? It would be interesting to see what he did with Sir John—especially as he had no less a bass than Lablache on hand for the part. Mercadante's 'Gioventu di Enrico V.' appears to be the only opera concerned with Shakespeare's Henry IV.; I do not know how far Falstaff plays a figure in it. Salieri wrote a 'Falstaff,' and Adolphe Adam produced a one-act opera bearing the same name, both works being apparently based on the 'Merry Wives.' The fat knight is also dragged into Ambroise Thomas's setting of 'A Midsummer Night's Dream.'

We see thus that our greatest comic character has had little attraction save for foreign composers, and even they concerned themselves with the inferior Falstaff of the 'Merry Wives'—perhaps inevitably, as the play provided them with a better book than could have been got from 'Henry IV.'

Hitherto the only composer who has gone to this play, taken the real Falstaff, and shown that, so far from being merely a fat buffoon, he was a richly human figure and a wit, is Elgar, whose symphonic study of the character (a masterpiece of music and an extraordinarily subtle piece of psychological analysis) will perhaps be properly understood and valued some day. Happily, Elgar is now joined by Holst, with an operatic work (modestly styled 'Musical Interlude') in which the chief character is Falstaff in some of his best moments.

The title leads one to expect no more than a mere lifting-out of one of the scenes laid at the Tavern in Eastcheap. Thanks, however, to some skilful joinery, the work gives us a good deal more. It is compounded of two lengthy extracts, the first from Act 2, scene 4, of the first part of 'Henry IV.'; the second from Act 2, scene 4, of the second part of the play. This gives us three of the best of the comic scenes—the 'men in buckram' episode; the mock king and prince duologue; and the brawl which ends in the casting out of Ancient Pistol—'the finest tavern scene ever written,' says Masefield. There is also a brief passage from Act 1 of the first part—the Prince's soliloquy that ends scene 2; and another, beginning 'Harry is valiant,' from Falstaff's speech at the end of Act 4, scene 3, of the second part. The remaining constituents are interpolations—an old drinking song; the whole of the song 'When Arthur first in court began' (which is merely started by Falstaff in the actual play), and the old ballad, 'Lord Willoughby,' sung as a unison chorus by soldiers, 'off.'

The characters are Falstaff (bass—need it be said?); Prince Hal (tenor); Poins (bass); Bardolph (baritone); Peto (tenor); Gadshill (baritone); Pistol (baritone); Two Companions of Pistol (baritones); Hostess, Dame Quickly (soprano); Doll Tearsheet (mezzo-soprano); a Chorus of Soldiers (unseen, baritones); and a Drawer, who has nothing to do beyond attending to the frequent demands for sack. The scoring is for a very modest force: 1 piccolo, 1 flute, 1 oboe, 1 English horn, 2 clarinets, 2 bassoons, 2 horns, 2 trumpets, tuba (or euphonium), timpani, and strings. (The English horn and tuba parts are cued in and can be omitted.)

The music is founded on old English melodies from the Playford, Chappell, and Cecil Sharp collections, together with a couple of folk-tunes collected by the late G. B. Gardiner.

There are no fewer than thirty-eight folk-tunes and dances used in the work. A list is given, with the name and source ; and the point at which the tune is first used in the score is indicated by a reference to the text and the nearest rehearsal number. The list contains three themes marked 'Original.' In the Preface the composer drily hopes these are his own. They are ; and none the less so for being not merely neighbours of the folk-tunes, but obviously akin as well.

* To be produced by the British National Opera Company, at Manchester, on April 3.

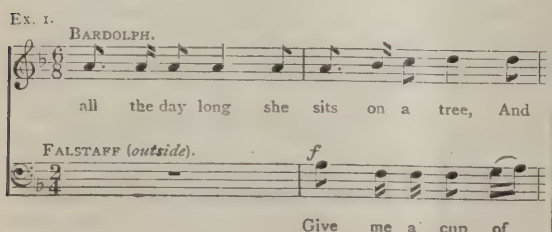
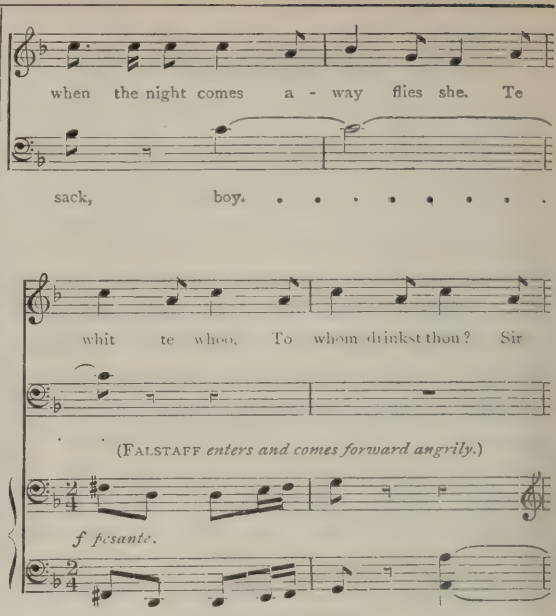
This basing of practically an entire work on borrowed themes is surely something new. Those who shake their heads at the scheme may be reminded that the composer is after all merely developing to its logical conclusion a principle long since accepted by opera composers of almost all schools, and used with brilliant success in certain cases where such a folk-basis seemed to be demanded by the libretto. 'Hansel and Gretel' and 'Hugh the Drover' are two modern examples that at once occur to the mind. If the question of originality is raised the answer is easy. Originality can be shown no less convincingly by a composer's handling of material than by its invention. Indeed, it may be shown even in his selection of suitable themes. However, for the completest of answers we need look no farther than to Shakespeare himself, who borrowed practically all his stories. Even the incomparable comic scenes which Holst has set owe something to an earlier play called 'The Famous Victories of Henry the Fifth,' from which Shakespeare 'conveyed' Ned, Gadshill, the Eastcheap Tavern and its Hostess, and the robbery scene. Yet (so differently do we view the question of borrowing when music, and not literature, is concerned) I must confess to some qualms on taking up this score and seeing on the title-page the words, 'The music, founded on old English melodies, by Gustav Holst.' Let me advise all who feel that way to reserve their opinion till they see what Holst has done with his material. Personally, it needed but a few pages to convince me that for this particular text the best of bases is the folk-music of the period.

A curious fact is the ease with which the prose text has been made to fit the markedly metrical themes. We have a striking example at the very start, on Falstaff's entry. The opera opens with Bardolph, Peto, and Gadshill singing, behind a curtain, an old drinking song (one of the interpolated items), 'Of all the birds that ever I see.' Into this ditty bursts the voice of Falstaff outside, thus :

Ex. 1.





when the night comes a - way flies she. Te sack, boy.
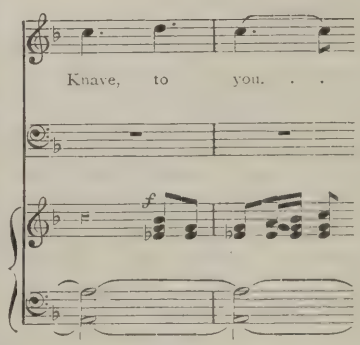
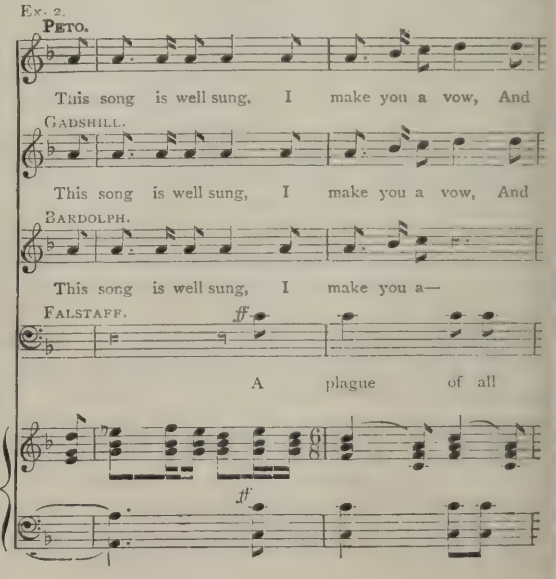
whit te whoo. To whom drinkst thou? Sir (Falstaff enters and comes forward angrily.)
f pesante.



He then enters angrily, and begins his famous denunciation of cowards, the others dropping their song one by one as they see him :

Ex. 2.



Peto.
This song is well sung, I make you a vow, And Gadshill.
This song is well sung, I make you a vow, And Bardolph.
This song is well sung, I make you a—Falstaff.
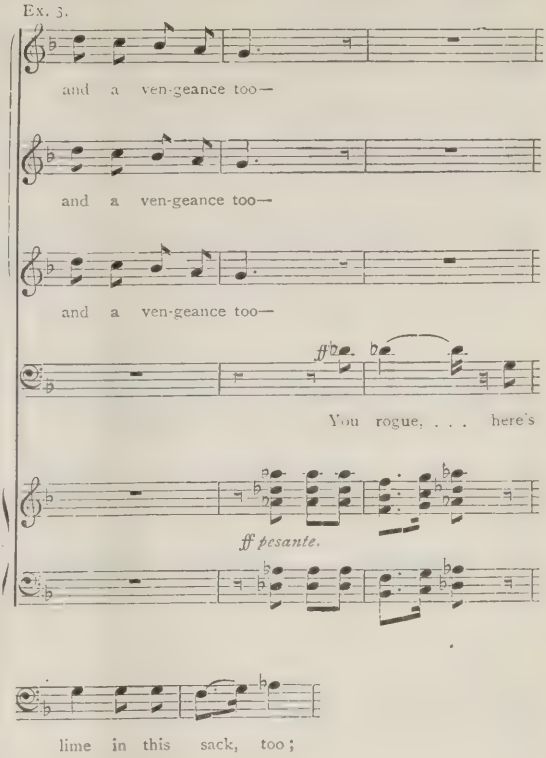
ff
A plague of all
ff

Does the reader recognise these Falstaff themes? At first they seem so good a fit, both as to words and style, that they suggest happy invention. Yet they are drawn from 'Gathering Peascods'—a country-dance tune so familiar to many of us through the recent revival that we wonder it was not 'spotted' immediately. Much the same may be said of practically all the airs used in this work. They constantly prove what was said above as to a composer showing his originality by his choice of material hardly less than by invention.

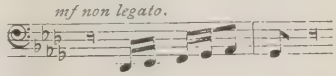
The reader will perhaps wonder how far and in what way Holst has avoided the twin dangers of scrappiness and monotony that must lie in wait when a shortish work is founded on some forty well-defined tunes, all roughly of the same type and period. Let us see what happens to 'Gathering Peascods,' and we shall have an answer on both points. Falstaff continues the tune, and it is taken up by his three associates. Into their half-cadence in F major burst orchestra and Falstaff, thus:

Ex. 3.



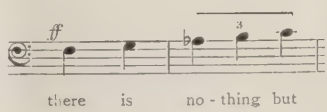
The orchestra echoes the last three notes of his phrase, and repeats them twice in even quavers; Falstaff takes them up in crotchets, and begins a phrase which foreshadows the next folk-tune to be used, 'The Maid in the Moon' the opening notes of which recall the little three-note phrase which was twice repeated by the orchestra a few bars previously. A further link is to be seen in the lead by the bass of the orchestral part:

Ex. 4



and Falstaff's:

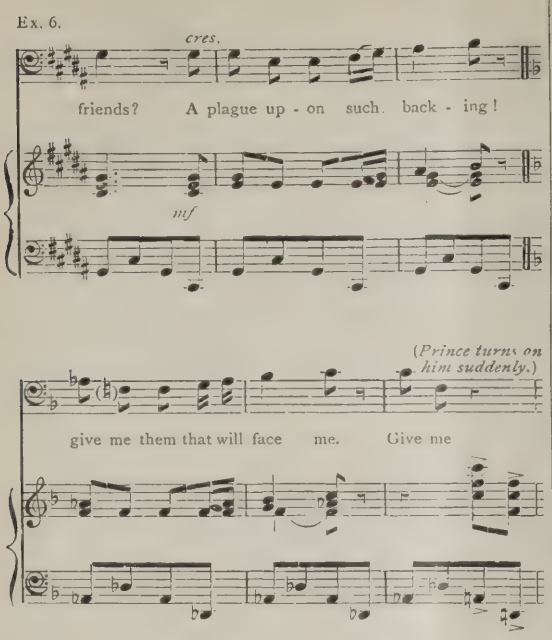
Ex. 5.



three bars before.

But we have not finished with 'Gathering Peascods.' A few pages later, while the tune 'I'll go and enlist' is being worked by the orchestra and Falstaff, the knight arrives at the point in the text, 'Call you that a backing of your friends?' and harks back to the earlier tune, thus:

Ex. 6.



cres.
friends? A plague up - on such back - ing!
mf
(Prince turns on him suddenly.) give me them that will face me. Give me (calling off.)
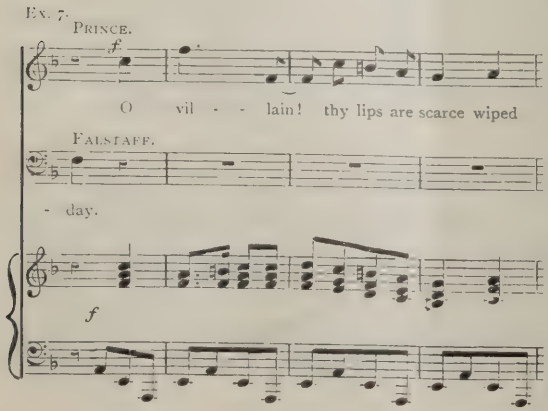
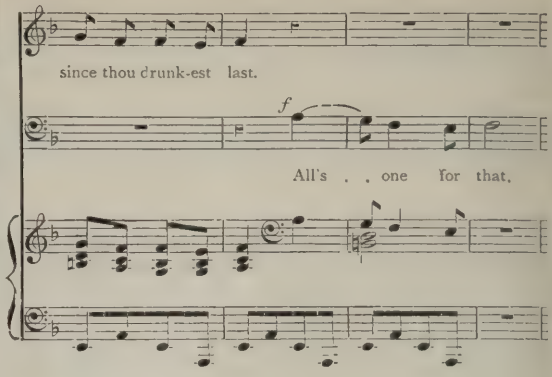
a cup of sack:

Yet there is no impression of the quotation having been dragged in, the rhythm  being common to Ex. 6 and 'I'll go and enlist.' (The amusing point at the end of Ex. 6 is a happy addition to the 'business.' The direction as to the Prince turning on Falstaff does not appear in the play.) Following up 'Gathering Peascods,' we find, a couple of bars after the passage quoted in Ex. 6, the tune taken up by the orchestra, thus bleakly varied and harmonized:

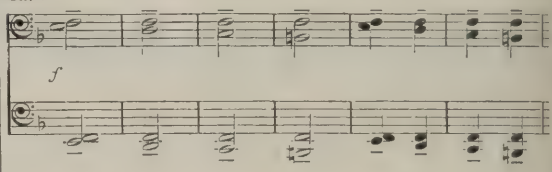
Ex. 7.





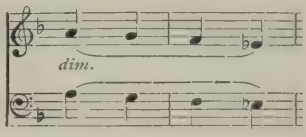
The few bars that follow not only give us a fitting accompaniment to Falstaff's drinking:

Ex. 8.



They do more. Their four-note theme very naturally grows out of the cadence of 'Gathering Peascods,' and has also an obvious connection with the following:

Ex. 9.



which appears in the bass from time to time during the ensuing page. As a result, when Falstaff starts the next folk-tune, we see that its opening phrase:

Ex. 10.

has been foreshadowed. I have been at what might seem to be unnecessary pains to show the composer's method of handling these old tunes, because there can be no doubt that for full enjoyment of the score the hearer must be aware of the neatness with which fragments of the tunes are made to look both backward and forward, and so give continuity to a texture that might otherwise become loose. In a word, the score is a lively example of the practical use of the time-honoured process of thematic development, repetition, linking-up, and so forth—a branch of technique that some of our younger composers are neglecting at their peril. In regard to monotony, the tunes themselves, with their unfailing melodic charm and rhythmic life, are the best of safeguards. As a counterblast to the 'symphonised syncopation' pretensions of which so much has been heard lately, this score could not be bettered. There is not a poor tune among the thirty-eight chosen, and some are splendidly stirring. Additional variety in plenty is provided not only by the scoring, and by the treatment on the lines above, but also by the composer's numerous characteristic dashes into remote keys, and indulgence in rasping dissonance. Of chromaticism in the ordinary sense of the term there is little; like the primitive - modern that he is, Holst rarely modulates. He simply lands us plump into the new key—which is generally the last one we should have thought of. The result is great harmonic interest and variety combined with the diatonic feeling called for by the material.

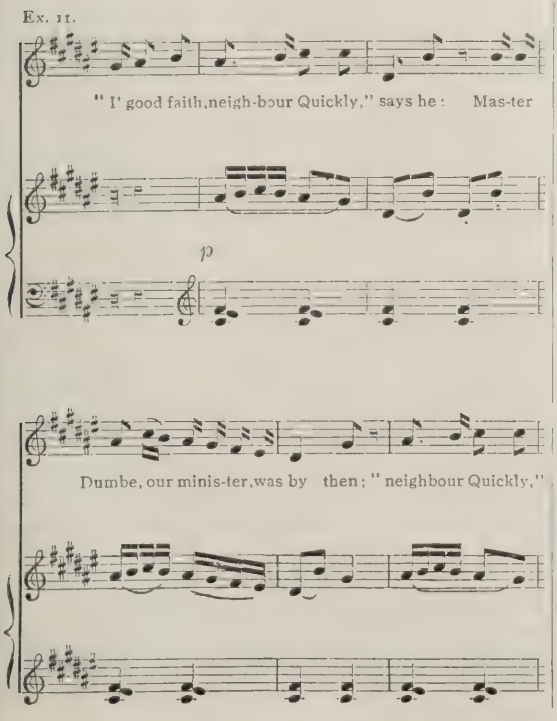
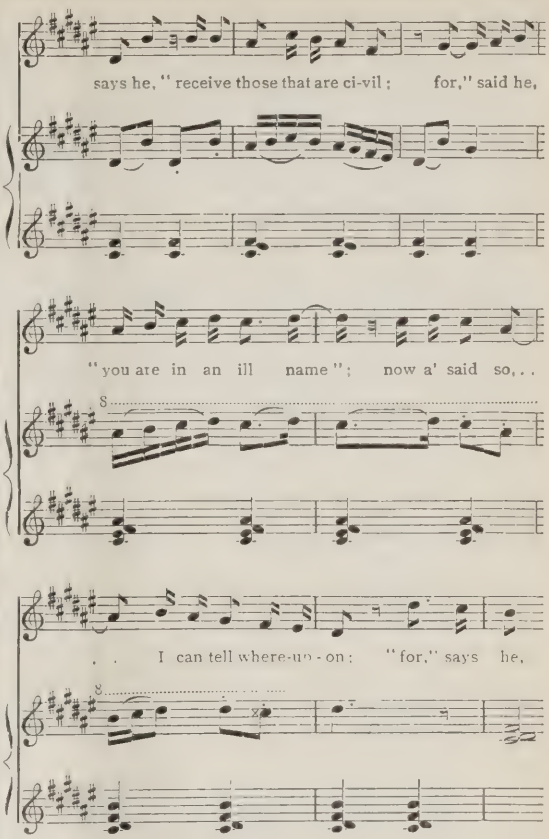
We have seen above that the folk-tune with which Falstaff makes his entry was so apt for the purpose that it seemed to be a specially composed rather than a borrowed theme. It would be easy to quote numerous other examples, but I confine myself to one, choosing a type very different in style, and easily one of the most humorous in effect — that used during Dame Quickly's garrulous account of what happened when she 'was before Master Tisick, the deputy, t'other day.' This part of her monologue opens with phrases from the country dance tune, 'Pepper's Black,' over sustained chords. The orchestra then takes up the tune and delivers it in full, softly, while the Dame maunders on with a simplified form :

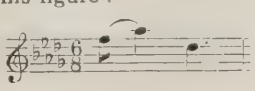
Ex. 11.





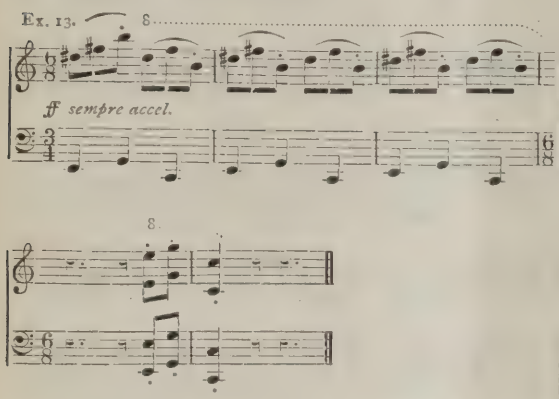
Could there be a happier choice? The air, with its constant turnings in a small circle, is as garrulous as the old woman herself; its frequent little rising figure (bar 3, &c.) is the melodic equivalent of the 'says he' with which all such comic characters sprinkle their speech. (What a line of old women of this kind our literature can show, from the Wife of Bath through Dame Quickly and Juliet's Nurse and a dozen more in Shakespeare, viâ Mrs. Malaprop, to such recent worthies as Mrs. Berry in 'Richard Feverel' and (in a lower scale), Mrs. Brown, and so on, to the riches of Dickens, with Mrs. Gamp leading the line! Incidentally it may be pointed out that if this last great creation owes anything to anybody it is to Dame Quickly. Was it a mere chance that one of her most amusing tricks of speech is hinted at by the Dame? ['Your pulsidge beats as extra-ordinarily as heart would desire.' 'Pulsidge' is pure Gampese.] Dickens's living at Gadshill gives him a link with 'Henry IV.': there is probably an even closer one in these two old women. What wouldn't we give for a third writer of the same calibre who would enrich us with a duologue between the matchless pair?) Of other points in Holst's treatment of folk-tunes, I mention only one—his occasional use of the leit-motiv principle. The best example is perhaps the opening three-note figure of the tune to which Doll Tearsheet makes her entry. This figure :

Ex. 12.



is a prominent constituent in all the passages wherein Doll takes a part, and in various forms is present in every bar of the last page of the work, where the Hostess bids Doll run to Falstaff. The curtain falls to its use in cross-rhythms and in two keys, C and B used simultaneously (does a reader murmur 'Zarathustra'?), clinched by a final emphatic delivery in C:

Ex. 13.



Of the three non-folk themes, two give rise to extended treatment, and call for a word. The Prince's soliloquy:

I know you all, and will a while uphold
The unyoked humour of your idleness, is given an unbarred air of an original type. Too often such portions of the text are set to recitative that is dry—sometimes ridiculous. Here we have a singularly successful blend of speech and melody—melody of a beautiful and unusual kind. This soliloquy may well prove to be one of the most striking moments in the work.

Even more important musically, is the setting of the two Sonnets. By means of a slight liberty with the text, the Prince and Poins, disguised as Drawers, do duty also as the musicians sent for by Falstaff. So when Falstaff says 'Sing, Sir' (not 'Play, Sirs,' as in the original), the Prince comes forward, and sings the Sonnet:

Devouring Time, blunt thou the lion's paws, to a modal tune of beautiful shape and rhythm, with a plain chordal accompaniment. As the Sonnet ends, Falstaff, who has been showing disapproval, bursts in, ff, with the old song, 'When Arthur first in court began,' and sings a few staves at the top of his voice. As the Prince begins the second sonnet ('When I do count the clock'), Doll Tearsheet puts her hand over Falstaff's mouth, and he continues his ditty very softly. Doll takes it up a little later (sempre pp) and the two melodies run on together till the end of the Sonnet, at which point a military march ('The Queen's Birthday') is heard in the distance. The Sonnet, 'Devouring Time,' is then resumed by the Prince, mf, with free imitative parts softly added by the Hostess and Poins. Against this trio Doll and Falstaff continue, pp, 'When Arthur first.' All this is unaccompanied. Midway the distant strains of the military march are again heard, and with the end of the Sonnet the March is in full blast, and Bardolph, Gadshill, and Peto enter hurriedly with the summons of the Prince to Westminster.

The whole of this passage is of great beauty musically, and, with the gradually darkening stage, the approach of the military march, and the abrupt change to stirring action at its end, should be no less striking from the dramatic point of view. True, the song is entirely out of keeping with the character, either of the Prince, or the singer he impersonates. Young Henry was of the direct—even commonplace—type that would have no use for anything so introspective as a Shakespeare Sonnet. But an inconsistency of this sort is nothing in opera, and here it is amply justified by its musical and dramatic effect, and also by the admirable contrast it provides to the rest of the music.

As an example of vocal part-writing it is a highly characteristic piece of work. The combination of the lilting, 'When Arthur first,' in 12-8 time with the sustained three-part modal writing in 4-4 gives rise to a rhythmic scheme of delightful freedom. I wish this ensemble were quotable, but a short extract can give only an imperfect idea of its beauty.

I must resist the temptation to discuss the wit and humour of the score; let it suffice to say that in this respect the setting is worthy of the text. (By the way, the bowdlerising of the latter might well have been a trifle more drastic. I say this, at the risk of being lumped with the Cockney girl in one of Pett Ridge's books, who disposed of Shakespeare in four words: 'Rude, I call him!')

Inevitably the reader will wonder how 'At the Boar's Head' compares with Holst's two previous works for the stage. 'Savitri' hardly comes into the case, because its subject and scope make comparison impossible. Looking at 'The Perfect Fool' and 'At the Boar's Head' side by side, however, the later work shows a marked advance in several respects. It has a greater certainty of touch, as might be expected, seeing the nature of its libretto and the choice of musical material. People differed as to how 'The Perfect Fool' was to be taken, and the mere existence of such a doubt or difference of opinion suggests some lack of direction in a work. 'At the Boar's Head' is not only uncomprisingly direct; it has also a consistency and homogeneity that some of us missed in the earlier work. On the dramatic side, too, more seems to be achieved, and achieved by far simpler means—the best test of all.

Writing, as I am, before the first performance, it behoves me to be on the cautious side; we know but too well the danger of prophecy when a stage work is concerned. But I can at least say that the perusal of a vocal score has rarely given me so much keen pleasure—even to chuckles. If but half the delights of the printed page make their way over the footlights this 'Musical Interlude' should at once become a rousing popular success.

THOME LUIS DE VICTORIA*

By J. B. Trend

Analogies between music and painting are always unwise, and nothing could be more unwise than an attempt to draw a parallel between Victoria and El Greco. All that they have in common is this: that they were contemporaries, that they studied in Italy, where they mastered all the technical secrets of their art, and that they spent the greater part of their lives, and ended their days, in Spain. Yet they have one other point in common: both are known in the north through publications of French writers, and in both cases these have been repudiated and condemned by competent Spanish scholars. The life of El Greco was pieced together for the first time by Don Manuel Cossío; it became known through a book of Maurice Barrès, which contained more statements and more ideas taken directly from the Spanish than was consistent with the dignity of an original work. The complete edition of the works of Victoria (published by Breitkopf & Härtel) and the collection of all the facts known of the composer's life was the great achievement of Pedrell; the biography most generally known, however, is that of Henri Collet. Pedrell protested with the greatest energy that the Victoria presented by M. Collet was false, and accused him besides of a breach of confidence. Into this last question it is impossible to enter. The facts of the two books are that M. Collet's biography is readable, and Pedrell's is not. On the other hand, Pedrell —who knew more about Victoria than anyone else—declared that the French biographer had misrepresented his subject; and, what is more important, that he was not in possession of some of the essential biographical facts, especially those of the last years at Madrid.

It is remarkable that in the case of both Victoria and El Greco, the French biographers have regarded their subject from much the same standpoint. They see them through a glass darkly; for M. Barrès it was 'Le Secret de Tolède,' while for M. Collet it was 'Le Mysticisme Musical Espagnol.' There was, of course, no 'secret' for Sr. Cossío. Toledo and the art of El Greco were things to be explored, known, understood, and felt. Work hard, and keep your eyes open, has always been his motto. For Pedrell, the important thing was to see what notes Victoria actually wrote, and to print them so that they might be sung as he intended. The composer's 'meaning' would be revealed by his music; mysticism (in that sense) was no concern of a musician.

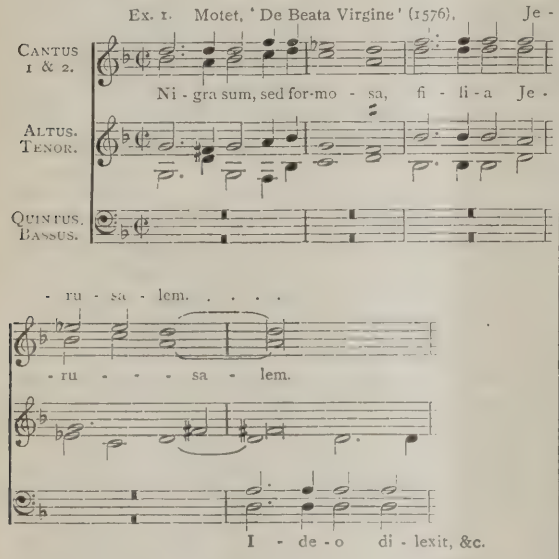
The methods of these Spanish investigators had the advantage of drawing attention to facts which might otherwise have been forgotten. Greco, born in Crete, worked at Venice in the studio of Titian, and felt the influence of Tintoretto—a curious training for one who was to become a 'mystical' painter. Victoria was influenced by Giovanni Maria Nanino (1545-1607) and Luca Marenzio (d. 1599), both of them famous, not for Church music, but for madrigals. All the music of Nanino, published before Victoria left Rome in 1579, was secular music; and Marenzio, whose first book of madrigals was published the year after, concentrated his attention on secular music, and is usually regarded as the greatest of all composers of madrigals. It is improbable that Victoria was a pupil of Nanino; both men were about the same age, and Victoria's first book of Motets appeared in 1572, the year before Nanino's school was opened. Nanino, as director of a school of music (in which Palestrina afterwards held an appointment), began by training his pupils in the severe contrapuntal style, and warning them against florid writing; but he ultimately adopted the newer style of composition, like Victoria, and his Psalms for eight voices (1614) are full of rapid, syllabic rhythms, unexpected modulations and dramatic effects.

Victoria was born in the diocese of Avila, in Old Castile, about 1540; his family seems to have come from the neighbouring village of Sanchridián. If he had lessons from Escobedo, as was once thought, it must have been before he went to Rome, for Escobedo returned to Spain in 1554, and settled at Segovia. In 1565, Victoria received a grant of money from Philip II.; he went to Rome, and was entered as cantor at the Collegium Germanicum, founded by St. Ignatius Loyola thirteen years before. His first published collection of Motets is dated 1572; but there is liturgical evidence (which Pedrell duly noted) for dating some of them before 1570, and others before 1568. In 1573 he composed a setting of 'By the waters of Babylon,' for the removal of the German College from the Palazzo Colonna to a house near St. Andrea della Valle, which took place on October 17. In 1575 he was appointed Maestro di Cappella at St. Apollinare. He left Rome in 1579 as Chaplain to the Empress Doña Maria, the daughter of Charles V., and accompanied her to Spain in her retirement to the Convent of the Descalzas Reales at Madrid, where, in 1586, he became musical director. On her death, in 1603, he wrote his splendid 'Officium Defunctorum,' for six voices, and resigned the post of Maestro for that of organist. He died in 1611, on August 7 or 27.

* There is no authority for the Italianate spelling Vittoria. It is found on no document, nor on any title-page seen by the composer, and has nothing but custom to recommend it. The composer signed himself Thome de Victoria; while in documents relating to himself and his family, and drawn up by a notary, the name is spelled Vitoria or Bitoria. The conclusion is that it was spelled with a c, but pronounced without one.

The music of Victoria has been described as being 'generated from Moorish blood.' There never was a statement less in accordance with the facts. A Castilian by birth, a Roman by education, Victoria is one of the last and greatest representatives of the Flemish-Roman school of polyphonic Church music. The mystic realism of his music owes much to the discoveries of the madrigalists; he set Latin words to music as easily as if they had been his native tongue. The fervour and expressiveness of his work is mainly a question of technique, due to his mastery of all the musical resources of his time, and the example of composers like Marenzio and Nanino, who achieved their highest flights not in the Mass but in the madrigal:

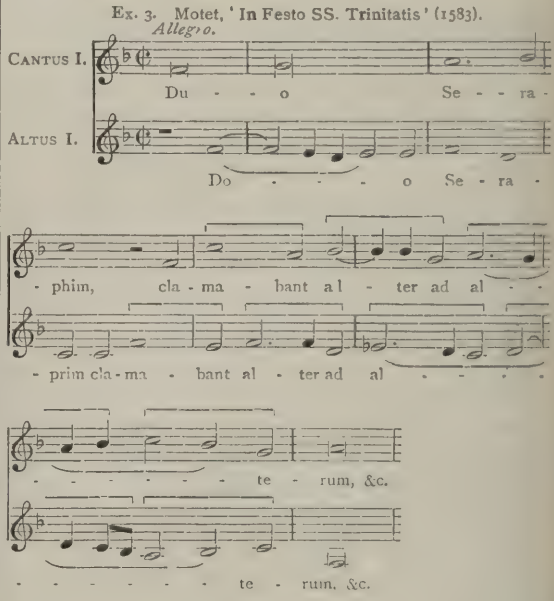
Ex. 1. Motet, 'De Beata Virgine' (1576).



Ex. 2. Motet, 'In Assumptione B. Mariæ Virginis' (1572).

Victoria was evidently a man of strong feelings and complex personality; there is nothing simple or naïf about him. Spanish musicians feel his music to be intensely Spanish; they find in him a peculiar attitude of mind which is immediately intelligible and makes them feel that he is one of themselves. He is as unmistakably and inimitably Spanish—Castilian, even—as a portrait by El Greco, a dusty road in La Mancha, or a conversation between Don Quixote and Sancho Panza. The gruesome cries of the crowd in his Passions are the musical expression of those characteristic groups of coloured, wooden statuary, carried in procession through the streets; the sensuous morbidity of Motets like 'Vere languores' or 'Jesu dulcis memoria' is less congenial to him than the swirling rhythms and flowing contrapuntal texture of those Masses and Motets which have their counterpart in the Assumptions and Resurrections of El Greco, in the Burial of Count Orgaz, and the tongues of fire in the picture of the Pentecost. One example will be enough to prove that a comparison between the attitudes of Victoria and El Greco is not altogether fanciful—the Motet, 'Duo Seraphim clamabant.' It is a complete expression in music of the mature Greco; there is the same unearthly brilliance, the strong conflicting rhythms, and the resultant, overpowering swing which dominates the whole composition

Ex. 3. Motet, 'In Festo SS. Trinitatis' (1583).



Perspective held no secrets for El Greco, and counterpoint no mysteries for Victoria; both were complete masters of all the technical subtleties of their art, and the work of many of their successors seems flat and thin by comparison. Approached from the side of technique—perhaps the only reasonable avenue of approach to a piece of music—Victoria's work is found to be full of novel and interesting methods. Peter Wagner, for instance, whose account of Victoria is the most balanced and reasonable which has yet been written, remarked on the fact that many of the Masses are built not (as was usually the case) on liturgical melodies or popular tunes, but upon fragments of the composer's own Motets. The different movements of the Mass are not necessarily based upon the same theme, but on different themes, all of which, however, are derived from the Motet from which the Mass takes its name. Again, Mr. R. O. Morris, in his admirable 'Contrapuntal Technique in the 16th Century,' gives various examples of Victoria's methods—his fondness, for example, of following up a full close by a plagal cadence by way of reinforcement.

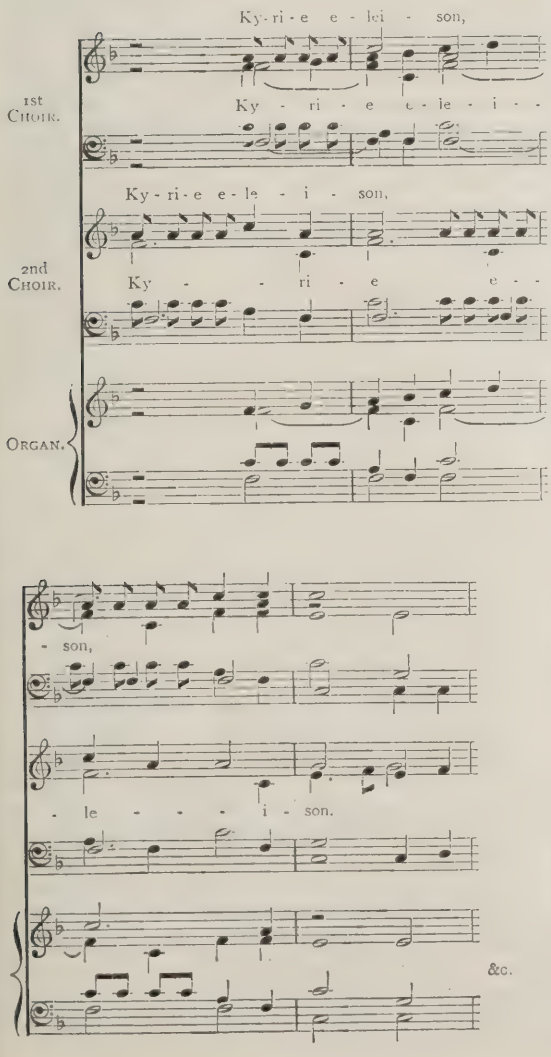
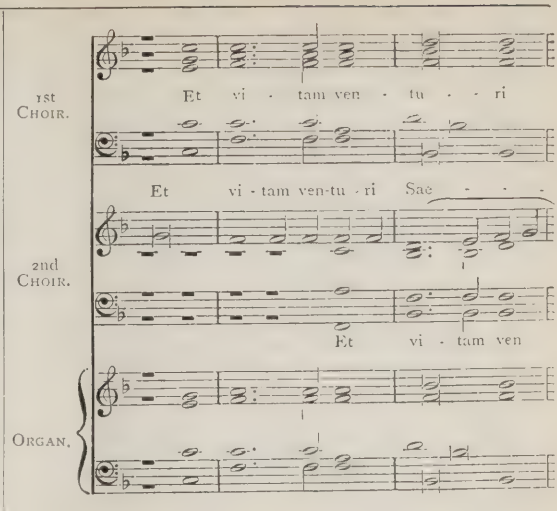
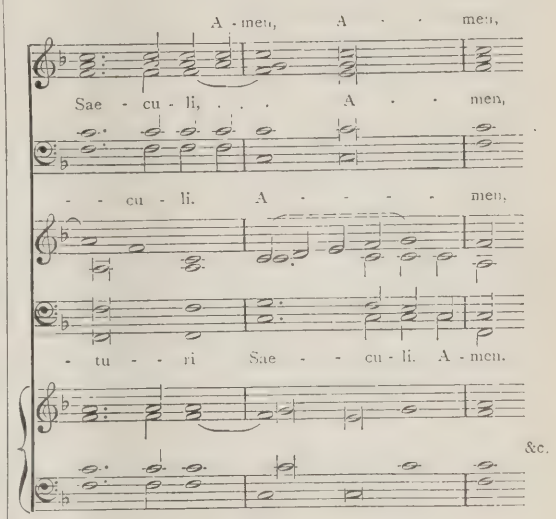
Victoria was a man of his time; he seems to have been fully aware of the developments which were going on in contemporary music. When he was nearly sixty he published a collection of Masses, Magnificats, Motets, and Psalms for large numbers of voices with organ accompaniment. Rapid, syllabic passages, and broad homophonic effects in which all the voices are employed, alternate with quiet polyphonic sections for few voices, conceived in the older manner; while the organ accompanies the first choir and often merely doubles the voice-parts:

Ex. 4. Missa, 'Pro Victoriâ' (1600).







The voices—eight, nine, or twelve—were arranged in groups, after the manner invented by Willaert, and practised with such success by the Venetian composers, and in the next century by Comes at Valencia and Benevoli at Rome: and (as the President of the International Society for Contemporary Music reminded his hearers at the Festival of 1924) a Mass in this style by Benevoli was also written for Salzburg, on the occasion of the dedication of the Cathedral there.

Padre Martini, who praised Victoria not only for his virtuosity, but also for his happy invention and delightful melodic phrases, also admired his artistic honesty in not pretending to write for more 'real parts' than he actually used. In the 'Ave Regina,' which he quotes ('Esemplare,' vol. i., p. 134), the eight voices are divided into two choirs which sing alternately. Yet from the beginning they overlap, the second choir entering on the heels of the first before the phrase is finished; and the distance between them becomes smaller and smaller until at the end all eight voices are singing together in a brilliant close at the words, 'Lux est orta.'

The most remarkable thing about this collection (published in 1600, at Madrid) is the part for the organ. The organist, like each of the other performers, has a book to himself; but while each singer has no more than his own part, the organist has a score with bar-lines, and the bar-lines, in the original, are drawn at irregular intervals. (This organ-part is missing from the set in the British Museum, but there are copies of it at Munich, Florence, and Modena.) The organ had certainly been used in Spain before 1600 to help uncertain singers in a type of music which was always becoming more difficult; but Victoria is one of the first to write a definite organ-part and expect it to be used during performance. Pedrell believed (and those who know anything of Spanish cathedral singing will be inclined to agree with him) that the practice of supporting or doubling the voices in polyphonic Church music was far older—at any rate in Spain, where choral singing is a natural form of expression in only one or two provinces; he mentions cases in which the voices were supported by two hautboys (chirimías) and two bassoons, or even by brass instruments; and at the present time even, there are Cathedrals in which Palestrina is performed with the aid of a bassoon which doubles the bass-part.

Victoria is certainly the greatest figure in the music of Spanish history. His name brings the sad reflection that, in his own country at any rate, he is known only to professional musicians, appreciated only by churchmen, and by no means all of those. Yet he is so great an artist that he should be the possession of all cultivated men and women, and his works no more the exclusive property of the Church than are the altar-pieces of El Greco. Henry Peacham, writing twenty years after the death of Victoria, calls him 'a most judicious and sweet composer,' and recommends him to the attention of all educated men, along with Byrd, Marenzio, and Orlando di Lasso. Victoria is numbered with the great madrigalists.

The difficulty in Spain—and the pioneers of contemporary music also have to contend with it—is that there is a large number of people (who ought to know better) who distrust music and despise musicians. Musica celestial is a colloquial Spanish expression which means 'absolute nonsense'; that music may be considered as the art of reasoning in sound is inconceivable. There is no chair of music (so far as I am aware) in any Spanish University; there has been no Hubert Parry to raise the status of music in the opinion of educated men, and there are still people who think that the only music in which a respectable person can be interested is folk-song. There is at present a considerable folk-song movement in Spain; it has produced men like Pedrell, and festivals like that organized by Manuel de Falla at Granada in the summer of 1922. It has led to elementary school-children being taught traditional songs, and finding that they are better to sing and easier to remember than the cuplés which come from the music-halls of Seville and Madrid. In other respects the Spanish folk-song movement has had no great effect on music; there has been nothing to compare with our own folk-song movement, which was, both in the enthusiasm of its workers and the harvest of splendid tunes which it brought in, like nothing so much as the fairy-tale movement in Germany a hundred years ago under the guidance of the Brothers Grimm.

What a foreign musician in Spain most regrets is the neglect of cultivated music—or, to be more accurate, the neglect of the cultivated music of other days—among educated men and women. There are lovers of painting—and all Spaniards are lovers of painting—who can appreciate their old masters, El Greco, Velasquez, and Goya, as well as peasant pottery and those things which are the 'folk-songs' of the decorative arts. Spaniards also read and recite their poetry, and feel it intensely, whether new or old; while at the same time they have as much admiration for 'cultivated' poetry as they have for old ballads and anonymous popular verses. Poetry in Spain has suffered neither from the tyranny of folk-lore nor from the hand of time, but both of these have combined to prevent any just appreciation of the old masters of Spanish music.

The Moors in Spain regarded music as a thing merely to distract the frivolity of women and the dissipation of men; and the Spaniards, as it seems, have never been able really to get away from this idea of music, unless it be to tolerate it in the service of the Church. An exhibition of unknown pictures by El Greco would attract large numbers of spectators, but a concert of unknown works by Victoria, Morales, or the Spanish madrigalists, would probably have no audience at all.

In Spain, unfortunately, music has remained the Cinderella of the arts.

JOHN DANYEL

By Philip Heseltine

When Thomas Tomkins published his 'Songs of 3. 4. 5. and 6. parts,' in 1622, he dedicated each madrigal in the set to a separate person—some to his relations, others to various eminent musicians of his day. Thus William Byrd, Orlando Gibbons, John Ward, Thomas Warrock, and others receive a madrigal apiece. Was it, then, with intent of subtle homage that Tomkins divided the two sections of a single madrigal between 'Doctor Douland' and 'Master John Daniell,' as though he would name them together as the two greatest living masters of accompanied song among his fellow-countrymen?* The supposition is not altogether fanciful. John Danyel is at present almost entirely unknown. The British Museum possesses the sole surviving copy of his only published work—a book containing eighteen songs for a solo voice accompanied by a lute and bass-viol, one song for four voices (the unusual combination of S.S.A.T.) and lute, one song for four voices and two lutes, and one lute solo, a set of variations on a tune also treated by William Byrd (for viols) and William Inglott (for virginals), and here quaintly entitled 'Mrs. Anne Grene her leaves be greene,' in honour of the book's dedicatee; and that is all we know of Danyel's compositions. Of his life we know next to nothing. There is no account of him in Grove's 'Dictionary.' But as a composer of serious songs in extended form he stands second only to John Dowland among the composers of the great period of English song; and for the bold originality of his harmonic sense, which is always controlled by a polished technique and a sure instinct for beauty of sound—and, too, for the breadth and spaciousness of his style, so widely different from the almost miniature song-forms of Rosseter, Campian, and others, Danyel deserves an honourable place in the history of music.

He was brother to Samuel Danyel the poet—probably a younger brother. Fuller, in his 'Worthies,' says that Samuel Danyel was the son of a John Danyel whom he describes as a 'music-master,' adding that 'his harmonious mind made an impression on his son's genius, who proved an exquisite poet.' But nothing is known of the father, and Grosart in his Memorial-Introduction to Samuel Danyel's complete works suggests that Fuller may have confused the musical brother John with the father. According to Fuller, Samuel Danyel was born in 1562, 'not far from Taunton, Somersetshire.' We do not know the date and place of John Danyel's birth. He took his Mus. Bac. degree at Christ Church, Oxford, in July, 1604, and in 1606 he published his book of 'Songs for the Lute, Viol, and Voice,' at the Signe of the White Lyon, Paule's Church Yard.

The book is prefaced with an interesting dedication—the only verse dedication, save in the books of Campian, to be found in the English song-books of the period:

To Mistress Anne Grene, the worthy daughter of Sir William Grene of Milton, Knight

That which was only privately compos'd
For your delight, fair ornament of worth,
Is here come to be publicly disclos'd
And to an universal view put forth,
Which having been but yours and mine before (Or but of few besides) is made hereby
To be the world's, and yours and mine no more.
So that in this sort giving it to you
I give it from you and therein do wrong
To make that which in private was your due
Thus to the world in common to belong,
And thereby may debase the estimate
Of what perhaps did bear some price before.
For oft we see how things of slender rate,
Being undivulg'd, are choicely held in store,
And rarer compositions once expos'd
Are (as unworthy of the world) contemn'd.
And therefore why had it not been enow
That Milton only heard our melody?
Where Baucis and Philemon only show
To Gods and men their hospitality
And thereunto a joyful ear afford
In midst of their well welcom'd company
Where we (as birds do to themselves record)
Might entertain our private harmony.
But fearing lest that time might have beguil'd
You of your own and me of what was mine,
I did desire to have it known my Child
And for his right, to others I resign.
Though I might have been warn'd by him, who is Both near and dear to me, that what we give Unto these times, we give t' unthankfulness,
And so without unconstant censures live.
But yet these humours will no warning take,
We still must blame the fortune that we make.
And yet herein we do adventure now,
But Ayre for Ayre, no danger can accrue;
They are but our refusals we bestow,
And we thus cast the old t' have room for new,
Which I must still address t' your learned hand
Who me and all I am shall still command.

John Danyel.

The Milton where Danyel stayed was the little hamlet of Milton Clevedon, between Shepton Mallet and Bruton, in Somersetshire. This dedication is so different in tone from the conventional panegyrics usually addressed by the composers of the time to their patron, that one is inclined to think of Danyel rather as a friend of the Grene family than as a musician employed in their service; and, indeed, Anthony à Wood, in his 'Athenæ Oxoniensis,' says that Samuel Danyel came of a wealthy family. But on this point there is no certain evidence.

John Danyel seems to have shared his poet-brother's modesty and reluctance to publish his work. Samuel Danyel's first publication—the famous 'Delia' sonnets—was practically forced upon him by the surreptitious inclusion of twenty-seven of his sonnets in Newman & Nashe's pirated edition of Sidney's 'Astrophel and Stella' (1591). In dedicating his own edition of the sonnets to the Countess of Pembroke ('Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother'), in 1592, Samuel Danyel wrote:

> Although I rather desired to keep in the private passions of my youth from the multitude, as things uttered to myself and consecrated to silence; yet seeing I was betrayed by the indiscretion of a greedy printer, and had some of my secrets bewrayed to the world uncorrected, doubting the like of the rest, I am forced to publish that which I never meant. But this wrong was not only done to me, but to him whose unmatchable lines have endured the like misfortune, Ignorance sparing not to commit sacrilege upon so holy reliques. . . . For myself, seeing I am thrust out into the world, and that my unboldened Muse is forced to appear so rawly in public, I desire only to be graced by the countenance of your protection, whom the fortune of our time hath made the happy and judicial Patroness of the Muses (a glory hereditary to your house), to preserve them from those hideous Beasts, Oblivion and Barbarism.

And again, in the preface to 'Tethys' Festival; or, The Queen's Wake' (1610), he writes in the same vein:

> I thank God I labour not with that disease of ostentation, nor affect to be known to be the man, digitoque monstrarier hic est, having my name already wider in this kind than I desire, and more in the wind than I would.

In 1618, John Danyel succeeded his brother as censor to all plays performed by the Children of the Queen's Revels, a company of youthful actors with which two other composers, Philip Rosseter and Robert Jones, had been associated some years previously; and in the following year the poet died, at Beckington, in Somersetshire, where he is buried, having appointed his 'faithful brother' John his sole executor. Four years later John Danyel published an edition of his brother's poetical works, with an epistle dedicatory 'To the High and most Illustrious Prince Charles His Excellence' (afterwards King Charles I.), which opens thus:

> Sir: Presents to gods were offered by the hands of graces; and why not those of great Princes by those of the Muses? To you, therefore, Great Prince of Honour and Honour of Princes, I jointly present Poesy and Music; in the one the service of my defunct Brother, in the other the duty of myself living, in both the devotion of two Brothers, your Highness' humble servants.

In 1625, John Danyel is mentioned as being a member of the Royal company of the musicians for the lutes and voices. And that is all we know of him, except his music.

I have said above that Danyel excelled as a composer of serious songs on a large scale. But his half-dozen shorter songs in lighter vein (of which three—'Coy Daphne,' 'Why canst thou not as others do?' and 'I die whenas I do not see her,' are already available in a modern edition, and the other three will be issued shortly) are equally individual. They have not the merry, light-hearted gaiety of Jones and Campian—their texts would scarcely warrant it—but there is in them a strength of line and a firmness of structure that are all Danyel's own. Unlike many songs of the period, they are all-of-a-piece from start to finish; the melodic outline is sustained throughout the song, and is not a mere agglomeration of short phrases.

Of the serious songs, the most important are two cycles of three songs—or perhaps one should rather call them songs in three movements. The first bears the title, 'Mrs. M. E., her Funerall teares for the death of her husband,' and is a work of poignant and sustained beauty; the second, which is the more remarkable of the two, has been recently issued under the title of 'Chromatic Tunes,' though it bears no special title in the original song-book. The text is as follows:

> Can doleful notes to measur'd accents set
> Express unmeasur'd griefs which time forget?
> No, let chromatic tunes, harsh without ground,
> Be sullen music for a tuneless heart.
> Chromatic tunes most like my passions sound,
> As if combin'd to bear their falling part.
> Uncertain certain turns, of thoughts forecast,
> Bring back the same, then die and dying last.

The rise and early development of chromaticism in English music is a rather mysterious subject. Musical historians have accustomed us to associate chromaticism in the music of the Renaissance with the Italians, Cipriano de Rore, Luca Marenzio, and —most daring of all—Gesualdo, Prince of Venosa. But the chromaticism of the latter is mainly homophonic, and, moreover, the madrigals in which the most remarkable examples of it occur did not appear until 1611. How, then, are we to account for the appearance in England, as early as 1597-98, of two such works as Weelkes's three-part madrigal, 'Cease sorrows now,' and Giles Farnaby's four-part canzonet, 'Consture my meaning,' in which a fully-developed sense of chromatic harmony is interwoven into the polyphonic tissue with such consummate mastery that it is evident that, so far from being experiments in a strange idiom, these works, together with Danyel's 'Chromatic Tunes' of 1606, are but the culmination of a train of musical thought which must have been occupying composers' minds for many years previously. It is, of course, easy to show that much earlier in the 16th century English musicians of the strict contrapuntal school admitted into their compositions far stranger combinations of sounds than did their Italian colleagues, but there is a very wide difference between the rare and comparatively mild examples of chromaticism to be found in the works of Byrd and his predecessors, and the chromaticism of Weelkes and Farnaby and Danyel in the works referred to above.

Danyel's song is constructed on such big lines, and each section is so homogeneous and closely knit, that it is difficult to convey any adequate impression of its style by means of short quotations. The first part, comprising the first couplet of the poem, is evolved from a subject which is developed fugally:

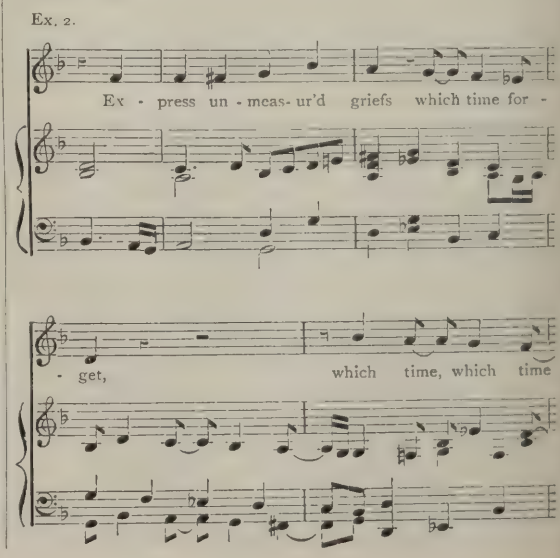
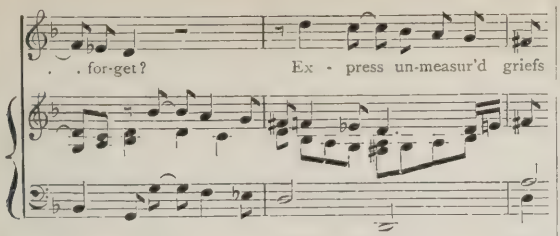
and the words 'unmeasur'd griefs which time forget' are treated in a wonderfully expressive manner:

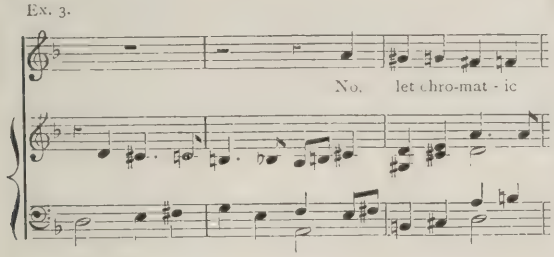
Ex. 2.

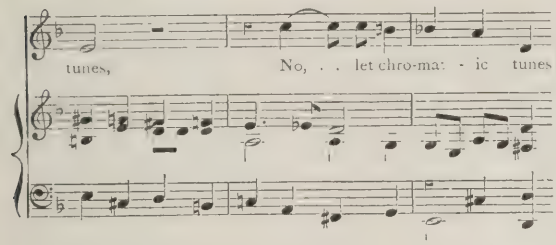




The second part opens with a phrase of a kind which, familiar though it became in the time of Purcell, must have sounded strange indeed to the amateurs of 1606:

Ex. 3.



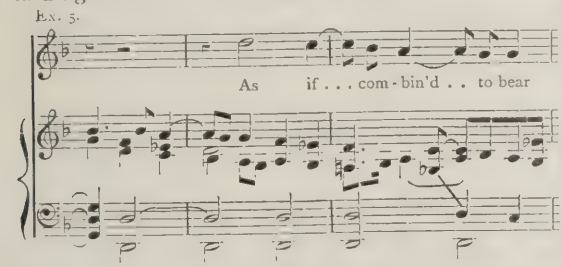


Another characteristic of Danyel is his wonderful use of pedal-points, as at:

Ex. 4.

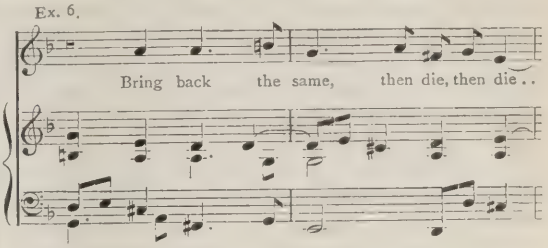
and again at the end of the second part:

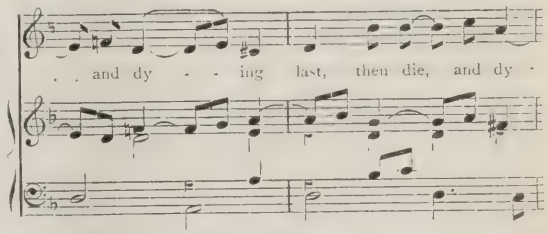
Ex. 5.

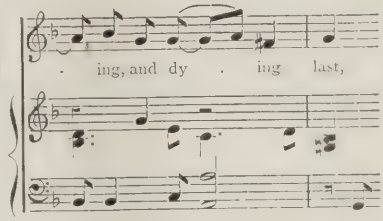


The third part of the song is less chromatic, but no less remarkable than the preceding sections, on account of its subtle rhythmic designs:

Ex. 6.







Another beautiful pedal-point brings to a quiet conclusion what is surely one of the finest songs ever written by an Englishman.

PERSONALITY IN PURPLE

By Harry Farjeon

Suppose there were craftsmen adept in the arrangement of beads: beads of varied colours—red beads, yellow beads, beads blue, green, and white. And suppose these workers, employing the same materials, using the same colours, yet managed each to produce in his own particular designs, galaxies glowing with some glory absent from all the others, which subtly stamped the work as his own. We should recognise this special trend of thought as personality, and its vivid appeal would so powerfully call us that we should pay little heed to the mere colours through which it wrought.

Let us now take it that through some mischance these craftsmen had no purple beads; had never used them, or thought of them as possible for use. In time there would come along another with eyes keen for this deficiency, which by skill or luck he would make good. Purple beads would he display, and violet and mauve, and his work would startle the world with a glamour that was new: a glamour that appeared to be, not only thrillingly new, but also intensely individual. Perhaps our purple friend would judiciously introduce his striking beads as companions of the reds and the yellows; perhaps he would harmonize the whole, and rest content with having added one word to a language already rich. . So, indeed, had in its time that colour-language been built up . . . one recalls the days when there were no orange hues and no salmon-pinks. But a discoverer is not always modest. Like as not, the one in question would disregard the palette of the past and would blazon purple—purple alone, save for the vivid violet and the gentler (if more sophisticated) mauve.

Now, of course, it is possible that these new necklets, bracelets, gem-studded bags everywhere seen might be as beautiful as the trinkets which have come to be un-modish. Almost certainly some of them are. Yet one doubts whether these, the real masterpieces, are exclusively purple. For what does one notice about a new colour? Why, the colour—not what is done with it. It is personality, exemplified by using an understandable language in a new way, that makes work great work. Personality does not show itself in the discovery of a new language. The finder of a superior gold-mine may chance to be an inferior goldsmith. He will glitter, of course, all studded, belted, and booted in gold. But what counts is the way these studs, these belts, these boots are made.

There advances now into public view yet another craftsman in beads: a man of some original power, but a man bemused and confounded by this purple—a tottering Cæsar, indeed. What does he do with it? Alas! the same as the other chap. Or, if his work be different, the difference passes unnoted, for the colour is still new, and new colour blindingly attracts. So the personality of this very real soul gets no chance of expressing itself: all it can do is to utter, in undistinguishable voice, the words of another.

To descend from the high lands of allegory: Who can use Scriabin's harmonic scheme without becoming himself a sort of washed-out Scriabin? Who can dabble in the turgid waters of the tonal scale without bringing to the surface 'Poissons d'Or' or their kindred? And may we not doubt whether we have the true Scriabin as we have the true Mozart and Beethoven (so alike in language, so remote in outlook)? To speak personally, there are few works I would rather hear at this present moment than 'L'Extase.' Yet I wonder whether there is not here an exceptional example of greatness asserting itself over the disabilities of a new language, so that one detects, even through the baffling glories of the purple, an emperor's soul.

They say there are to be yet newer beads. And not, I am told, even made of glass or any coloured faïence. Iron, I have heard—dull, rusty iron. With holes in them, certainly—holes wide enough to compass the wrists and ankles of those who make them. Well, well; if you move fast enough you outstrip progress, and this does seem to necessitate being chained to the wall till it catches up with you. So perhaps it's all all right.

THE TYRANNY OF THE AUDIENCE

By William Wallace

There is one aspect of music performed in public which from time to time has aroused protests from the more thinking, and it might be said, the more musical, public, and that is the assumption of authority on the part of certain people in different parts of the house. While it is the business of the conductor to control the orchestra, his position becomes difficult in knowing and deciding how to deal with the audience. He may bestow a glance, none too gracious, on those who take their seats or applaud during the short interval between two movements of a symphony. He may be gratified when his efforts are handsomely recognised, and invite the instrumentalists to their due share in the honours. He may, with a slight gesture, convey his thanks to an individual player. But there are times when he should not go even that length.

For instance, a deputy was replacing the regular conductor of a series of orchestral concerts. He was as short in vision as he was short in inches, and his desk was of the old-fashioned vertical pattern. He must have presented a grotesque appearance to the orchestra. The horn-player, using the habitual F crook, forgot at a critical lead and well-known passage that he had to transpose, as his part was written for the E♭ crook. The result was as surprising to the orchestra as it was to those who knew the work by heart, yet at the end of the movement the conductor ostentatiously singled out the musician for special commendation.

The influence of the conductor over the orchestra is of vital importance, but what is he to do when the audience gets out of hand? This brings us, among many things, to the question of encores, generally called the 'encore nuisance'—and nuisance it is.

Audiences as a rule do not stop to think about the immense amount of 'staff-work' that has to be undertaken before the doors of the concert-room are opened. They do not know that the numbers in a programme are calculated to the minute, and that in the construction of a programme—than which nothing is more difficult—the time of performance of each number is considered so as to keep the concert within reasonable bounds. When a popular artist is engaged, a slight allowance is made for an 'extra' or encore piece. It is convenient, therefore, to draw up the programme so that the soloist performs just before the interval. This allows those who do not care to listen to the encore to leave their seats. It is not always possible to make this arrangement, and the incessant demand for an encore, whether it is complied with or not, is sufficient to confuse, if it does not actually annul, the impression created by the soloist's concerto or principal number.

The question arises, How far is the conductor authorized to allow encores, and what is his position in refusing them? He is unhappily situated in this respect, for while he does not wish to give offence by permitting them, he will offend many by refusing them.

An audience cannot be picked or 'packed,' and in it there are bound to be inconsiderate people who imagine that because they are in a building they can disregard the reasonable requests of the management by behaviour which they would not venture to display in the open street. Do what the conductor may, and howsoever the artists may second his wishes to refuse encores, the irreconcilables will have it their way in the end, and acquiescence may be the only course in the interests of peace. It certainly is his to give a sign to the attendant to change the number on the board, if one is in use; he may tap on his desk and make the preparatory gesture for the next work, or he may in the last resort walk off the platform until the applause has died away.

He may incur some unpopularity, but he will be supported by the bulk of the audience which has the commonsense to respect the words, 'No encores allowed,' printed boldly in the programme, and has the good manners to pay heed to them.

It is not uninstructive to study audiences in this connection, though the scrutiny may lead to cynical conclusions. Applause is a compliment when kept within bounds; it can also be an impertinence, and when the encoré is insisted upon, it can be met by impertinence. When Rachmaninov went to the pianoforte to play an encore piece after a concerto, he turned to the orchestra and made a grimace, as if to signify that enthusiasm was of nothing to him, and revenged himself by playing his hackneyed Prelude in C sharp minor. It was Patti, with her 'Home, sweet home,' all over again, the outstanding difference being that Rachmaninov appraised the applause at its true value and snubbed his audience, while Patti pandered to hers.

Applause has four separate sources of origin:

1. Personal friends and admirers.
2. Fellow-artists studying or working in the same medium.
3. The herd or group instinct.
4. Those single individuals who by their excited clapping attempt to impress their more reticent, but no less appreciative, neighbours, as being in themselves persons who recognise 'great art.'

Of these the first is comprehensible. The phrase 'personal friends and admirers' has been the excuse for many a recital which, from a musical point of view, has been little short of criminal, and ought to have led to the incarceration for the term of their natural lives of crim. con. abetters and 'onlie begetters.' While personal friends can fill a small hall, it is unlikely that they will muster in sufficient strength to form the greater part of an audience at an orchestral concert, but they can be noisy enough for all that.

The outstanding difficulty about all public performances is that the listener's power of selection is limited. He cannot go to a concert to hear one particular work. He may have to sit out a mass of sound which disturbs the mental equilibrium which he had cultivated in order to be detached and receptive. He cannot enter the concert-room as he would a picture gallery, with his mind bent upon the study and understanding of one work alone or a group of works, and his fine adjustment may be upset when he finds himself the unwilling captive of an undiscriminating mob, showering its applause when silence would have been more meet.

Ovations can be and are engineered, but there is always a risk. A certain orchestral work was given for the first time. It was unusually dull, and the half-hearted applause faded away in a few seconds. In one quarter of the hall, however, one or two enthusiasts kept it up, when, almost in silence and to the amazement of everybody, the composer coolly walked on to the platform and bowed.

We now take the second source: fellow-artists professing the same medium. There is something to be said in their defence. They go to a concert to learn; it is part of their training. It is their determination to coax out of the soloist as much as possible, to study his method of interpreting sharply contrasted styles, and they are persistent in their clamour, even though they themselves have experienced the mental and physical exhaustion that follows a strenuous performance, with the drug-like action of an encore as a transient stimulant. To them the encore is 'dope.'

It may be asked, What is to be gained by watching a singer's throat through an opera-glass? The full educational value to be derived from a performance comes from following the music and noting readings and points—through the ear. A gallery seat is scarcely the ideal spot for studying a pianist's technique, and concert-managers, or performers, for that matter, are not as a rule over-complaisant in accommodating novices with chairs beside the instrument. Hence enthusiasts have to take their enjoyment standing up, but they display their lack of proportion or artistic sense by showing a desire to have a performer spend two or three minutes over a trivial piece after he has given them a fine work of art. But possibly the concerto has so bored them that they wish a sucket afterwards. More 'dope.'

The herd instinct which is our third group opens up a psychological question of large dimensions. Before proceeding to discuss it, it may be appropriate to quote two modern French writers. Barine* says:

> Toutes les forces peuvent devenir dangereuses; cela dépend de 'l'usage qu'on en fait.' Et aussi des âmes qui reçoivent le choc, il faut qu'elles soient de taille à le supporter. L'action de la musique sur la société française n'a jamais, que je sache, été étudiée méthodiquement dans ses effets physiques et moraux. Si elle trouve quelque jour son historien, il devra sortir des nouveaux laboratoires de psychologie, à installation scientifique, où l'observateur se double d'un médecin. A cette seule condition, il pourra parler avec autorité.

After the performance of a 'star,' anyone who has disregarded the platform and studied the audience from a point of vantage, will have noted violent applause from one section, answered by another section, till the stimulus from these 'foci' has spread and the applause has become general. In this way a persistent group, possibly with no keen artistic motive, may so infect its neighbours and spread the disease that the entire house finds itself applauding, less in approval of the virtuoso than in automatic response to the energies of a few.

Let us carry this a little further. A musical audience is composed for the most part of people who know something about music, and, save in exceptional circumstances, they are familiar with a good deal of what is to be performed. Herein an audience of this kind differs from other collections or assemblages. Partisanship naturally there is, as in sport; a critical attitude of mind, also as in sport: but with this distinction, that the result can be forecast even though the performance fall short of the ideal. In sport the outsider may win, but no matter how futile the rendering, no one can say that Mozart or Beethoven 'also ran.' The musician may deplore a hapless performance and blaze with inward fury at points dropped or nuances exaggerated, but in his mind he carries his own ideal interpretation as a golden secret.

So it is that in music, anticipation founded on earlier study and knowledge paves the way for the outburst, and emotion may be damped or intensified according as a passage is mutilated or some hidden inner part is brought forward to heighten the fabric and enlarge the conception.

The mind that is musically attuned will seize upon these reflections and work in unison with other minds so that there is a unanimity in recognising them. At the same time they form what have just been called 'foci,' and the stimulus affects others. In this form of appreciation, as the result of anticipation, personal judgment is suspended as regards surroundings. The individual mind is so concentrated upon the receptive and æsthetic stimulus that the energy thus accumulated at high pressure must somehow find an outlet. This energy is communicated to others by some process at present imperfectly understood. It may be that a number of people, gathered together for one set purpose, such as listening to a concert, divest themselves to a large extent of that garb of immunity that they wear for ordinary occasions, and by so doing unconsciously render themselves susceptible to external influences which, under less emotional conditions, they would resist, and resist with scorn. So it may happen that the well-founded enthusiasm of a few may stampede an entire audience into an orgy of emotion. An individual in an audience may be so deeply steeped in criticism and appreciation that he is heedless of his neighbours: they, on the other hand, less apprehending, less capable of profound thought and consequently more susceptible, feel themselves constrained to join in and contribute to the general fracas.

There are two processes involved in listening to music: these are attention and tension. It is the giving way of the second that leads to those outbursts of physical energy known as applause. The strain of listening to music varies according to the temperament of the individual, and the concentration, the enforced silence, and suspension of bodily movement culminate, after a work of considerable dimensions, in a mental and physical reaction which has to find an outlet. What form this outlet takes will vary according as the individual is easily moved or is possessed of self-control. The physical influence, that is the sound, is not heard by all exactly in the same way, but all have a community of interest in it, although the potency of that influence will not be similar in every case. For we have to reckon with the unknowable mental influence.

The temporary but stringent 'repression' of outward manifestations of self during a performance reaches at its close a climax in which the individual expression is often exaggerated, no matter what form it may take. Possibly, too, the mental satisfaction and physical well-being that some feel at the end of a concert may be due to their having been able by their applause to take an active part in the proceedings and so throw off some of their accumulated energy.

The mimetic faculty, which may be dormant or extremely active, can and does effect an adaptability to a given situation, such as a concert in which numbers of people come together for a single purpose. Were the experiment to be tried of an audience giving freedom to its 'repressed' energy by singing at some point in the programme, it might so happen that it would accept a fine performance in a somewhat orderly manner rather than fly to an extreme perilously on the border of hysteria. But would this be safe? Only the other day, when a Welsh audience was invited to sing the Chorales in the 'St. Matthew' Passion, a voice in the audience cried, 'Let us have ——.' Heaven knows what a programme would be like if left to an irresponsible 'voice' with no sense of congruity.

It is possible that the Tuppermartinique in music, the Baileyfesticism, will be abandoned: time alone will show. We have become such megalomaniacs in every stage of life and state of death, that the grand scale is over-grand, overstrung. We have passed through a phase of monotony, of unending service, day after day, month after month, to the god of the machine, and irresponsible applause in the concert-room may paradoxically be as much an unconscious protest against the enslaving of the auditor, as the trade-union is exactly the opposite—the limiting of man's scope and a fettering of individuality in any shape or form.

In close relation with the herd are those people who are not content to be passive listeners but consider it necessary to demonstrate their deep appreciation of the performance. It is their 'hour,' their 'moment,' and they are determined not to lose an instant of it. The worst offenders are those who have not the patience to wait till the end of a song, but 'come in' on the top note. The shop-ballad can often be detected by the device of a heavy chord following the last note of the voice, a concussion which is a concession to the taste of the audience, and a weakness in avoiding an artistic ending—not always an easy thing to write. Such promiscuous applause becomes a habit. An audience has been known to burst out at the pianissimo in the last few bars of the 'Liebestod' even before Isolde's last note. Such people have no pleasure in the performance unless they can show their neighbours the extent of their taste, and when others join them they consider it as much a tribute to their own discrimination and example as an appreciation of the music. This is our fourth group.

Audiences perhaps do not realise the attitude of tried performers to constant recalls. An instrumentalist, the greatest of his kind, after several returns to the platform, exclaimed, 'But this is absurd. It is a music-hall.' Oddly enough it is music-hall audiences who know when to stop, and it is rare to find a 'turn' held up.

Sometimes there is more than a touch of malice in what an artist might regard as a compliment. At a concert of no great importance a young lady was playing a concerto. Following the fashion of the day she wore a very tight skirt. But she had not reckoned with the platform. There was a step up, then a few paces past the first fiddles, then a biggish step down to the pianoforte, all in full view of the audience. When she appeared she all but took a header into the instrument, and when the performance was over she just managed to mount the high step. This produced a titter. There was the other step to encounter, and here she had to make an awkward twist to get off the platform. She was recalled four times, not on account of her performance, but because of the joyous spectacle of her struggles in her skirt.

In the days of the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts a foreign singer, coming second in the programme, after two or three recalls took her stand beside the conductor, whose protests were not concealed, and repeated her number, an aria with a long recitative. The applauding portion of the audience had brought its ballad-concert manners with it, but was not quite prepared to have the whole thing over again. Anyway the lady had the satisfaction of having taken up forty minutes to herself. The concert was so prolonged that everywhere there were empty seats before it was over. Train services do not respect encores.

When audiences take the bit between their teeth the position of the conductor is not enviable, and accustomed as he is to the ways of the platform he cannot but surrender, often in his heart bewildered by the taste which allows a brilliant performance to slip past 'without a hand,' while claptrap and pretentiousness bring down the house.

In the early days of orchestral music in London it was not uncommon for whole movements of symphonies and concertos to be encored. Something of the kind happened recently. A distinguished pianist, in response to persistent demands from the audience, gave them what assuredly was a surprise. He repeated the greater part of the work which he had just played. Was there not just a tincture of sarcasm in the proceeding? The conductor was powerless. The concert was being managed by an out-of-hand rabble.

There is surely restraint in the appreciation of the finest art, without that excess which pushes even the sincerest effort to the verge of charlatanism and showmanship.

This tyranny of the audience, or rather of some members of it, is an affront to the intelligence. It has just been said that the true concert-goer puts himself into a receptive state beforehand so that he may derive all the profit that he is capable of assimilating. Ill-conceived and ill-offered applause is a destructive agent which intrudes upon that receptive state, and a carefully balanced programme as an artistic unit is torn to rags by the persistency of a rowdy minority. And when the minority has secured its end, and the encore piece is given, it shows what its appreciation and gratitude amount to by letting it pass in silence.

An example was noted at a recent concert. The audience was carefully watched at the end of a concerto, and it was found that little more than fifty per cent. of the people were applauding. (Fifty per cent. may appear an under-estimate, but they can make enough noise, all the same.) The pianist came back, bowed, and retired. The applause was resumed by about thirty-five per cent., increasing to fifty when the pianist reappeared for the second time, bowed, and again retired. The applause was now down to about twenty-five per cent., coming chiefly from three 'foci,' increasing to about thirty-five per cent. when the pianist appeared for the third time. There was now much activity on the part of the 'foci' but not sufficient to stimulate more than about twenty-five per cent. The pianist came back for the fourth time, and played a very short piece admirably. The three 'foci' were watched. When the pianist finished they did not move a muscle: they had got what they wanted: that was all.

In every audience there will be found people prepared to squeeze every ounce out of the performer, demanding, as it were, a bonus, and having so nebulous a sense of fitness that they upset not only their neighbours but also the programme as a carefully thought-out piece of work. It should not be left to a row or two of exuberant school-girls to waste time when the rest of the house has relapsed into silence. It does not occur to them, on a practical point, that they are preventing some of the audience from sitting out the concert. Such arbitrary assumption of authority and interference with the enjoyment of others is a species of obstruction which has its peculiar habitat in the concert-room, and would not be tolerated anywhere else, except in the House of Commons. The Closure might be borrowed, but who would be bold enough to apply it?

While the encore nuisance is the major horror of the concert-room, there are others equally disturbing. It is *dis*concerting to have knitting or crochetting, tempo rubato thrust in your face. At a crowded concert in St. James's Hall, the conductor angrily waved to a lady sitting behind the orchestra, who was wielding, off the beat of course, a huge red fan. It was quite as distracting to the audience who saw two different beats.

Audiences are often apt to forget that there are observances and obligations on their part just as essential as those on the part of the conductor. Perhaps some manager will take the bull by the horns and put notices in the hall that the concert is timed to end at such and such an hour, and if encores are insisted upon the last number will not be played. This drastic proposal would certainly offend some who had come specially to hear that particular work, but it might induce them to police their greedy neighbours and silence them.

The matter, unfortunately, cannot be left to be dealt with by the conductor and the management. They are in a very small, a negligible, minority, and they realise that they cannot control a mob.

But there is a way out. Let the conductor begin the next number, even in the midst of the prolonged applause, after having assured the soloist that no encores will be allowed. The more reasonable will subdue the disturbers with disapproving glances; the applause will die down, and when it has come to an end he will stop the orchestra, and, having secured the attention on which he insists, will coolly re-start the number. There you will have the conductor courageous, and all the people who are musical will rise to him at the end with one voice. But not, please, not, with Una voce all over again!

Ad Libitum

By 'Feste'

A recent issue of the Evening News contained an interesting article by Mr. R. H. Wilson, late chorus-master of the Manchester Hallé Choir. With most of Mr. Wilson's pronouncements everybody will agree, but I was sorry to see him trotting out the old comparisons between North and South in the matter of choralism. Boiled down, the customary remark comes to this: The volume of tone produced by the crack Northern choirs—especially at one of their annual or semi-annual performances of 'The Messiah'—is far greater than that of any Southern choir: it follows, therefore, that the choral singing of the North is the better of the two. But does it follow? Comparisons of the kind are of little use unless they are based on performances of the same music—or at least a similar type of music—given under the same conditions. In fact, we may go further and say that in order to be judged fairly the performances must take place on the same occasion. Too often such comparative criticism is made in this way: A critic hears a fine provincial choir under specially favourable conditions (a Festival performance of a well-known work, for example), and is rightly enthusiastic. Six months later he hears another choir (generally a London one) singing under no such special stimulus, and perhaps grappling with new or unfamiliar music. Is he enthusiastic? He is not. He promptly says (in print if he is a professional critic) something to the effect that the singing of the London choir was quite creditable—for London—but that, in regard to sonority, tonal splendour, vigour, power, vim, pep, dynamics, energy, and all the other synonyms for force, it was of course a poor thing beside the best Northern choirs. He may even go on to cite in proof the choir he heard sing a totally different work six months before!

The fact is there is no ground of comparison between (a) a choral society that gives two or three concerts during the season and that confines its efforts to more or less familiar works (or at all events to works in a familiar idiom), and (b) a choir whose object is the revival of neglected works and the performance of contemporary music of the most difficult kind. Of the latter type of body the three best-known examples appear to be the Newcastle Bach Choir and the London Oriana and Philharmonic Choirs. Like the man in the parable, they bring out of their treasury things new and old, whereas the more usual kind of choir generally sticks to the familiar. There is room for both—the one to achieve a model standard of performance, the other to do work that may be described as a blend of salvage and pioneering.

Meanwhile, the listener who hears a famous Northern choir sing 'The Messiah' and the Oriana perform one of its exacting schemes of out-of-the-way music of all periods (often with a selection of languages that suggests a recital by an accomplished soloist—I have heard the Choir sing in Latin, German, and French, in the same programme with no apparent discomfort, and largely from memory)—the listener, I say, who hears these widely diverse types of performance and finds nothing more useful to say than that the Oriana singers do not make so splendid a noise as the Northern choir with its 'Messiah,' gives himself away with both hands. If the two occasions lead to any kind of comparison at all, such comparison ought to be in favour of the Londoners, on the very good grounds of enterprise and versatility.

Another point in this comparison of North and South that is too often overlooked is the size and disposal of the population. Yorkshire and Lancashire are practically made up of towns big enough to provide ample material for large bodies of carefully-chosen singers, yet not so big as to preclude a strong spirit of local patriotism. Moreover, these towns are compact, and separated by distances so small that the enthusiasts in various centres can follow the doings of choirs other than their own. The disadvantages London suffers owing to its vast area are too well-known to need particularising. In regard to the South generally (apart from London, of course) the population is small in comparison with the North, and the few large towns are separated by great distances. Add to this the well-known temperamental differences between North and South, and it is easy to understand that the choralism of the two districts, like their methods of business and sport, and their amenities generally, will differ not only in kind but in character.

There is a wide difference between a County cricket match at (say) Leeds or Manchester and one at Maidstone or Taunton, and the difference is due to climate, surroundings, and the psychology of players and spectators. Yet who shall assert that Northern cricket is better than Southern on the ground that the crowds are larger and keener? And if, of the two, Northern cricket is technically better—as is probably the case owing to the large proportion of professionals taking part—is it a better game? Indeed, one is sometimes tempted to ask if it has not ceased to be a game at all. We in the easy-going South are less keenly competitive in sport, art, and (I am told) even in business. We are neither proud nor ashamed of it. It is mainly a matter of climate. How potent this factor is may be proved by the fact that when a professional footballer is transferred from the extreme North to the South, he usually either loses his form or needs a good part of the season to become acclimatised.

I use these sporting illustrations without apology, because they are the easiest and readiest way of explaining most of the differences between certain aspects of musical life at the top and bottom of England.

Thus it is not without significance that the developments of the musical competition festival in the South tend more and more towards the performance of an important work by the combined competitors. The accent is on 'festival' rather than 'competition.' The element of contest is present, but the test-pieces are extracted from the chosen work, and all the doings of the competitors and judges have for aim the performance of the complete work as a crown of the day's labours. Hence we have a little Hampshire town of less than four thousand inhabitants—Petersfield—turning its 1924 competition into a three days' Bach Festival, in which all the adult choirs did their bit. I myself, last year, saw and heard some hundreds of rustics from the villages round Winchester give a stirring performance of a Bach Cantata, with a first-rate amateur orchestra and professional soloists, conducted by Mr. Adrian C. Boult. I say I 'saw' them, because the appeal was almost as much to the eye as to the ear. It was a tonic to observe the tiers of ruddy faces, and to witness the obvious gusto with which the singers rolled out old Bach's long runs. Yet they were singing, not for the sake of getting more marks than anybody else, but for the mere sake of singing. And at another small Southern meeting—Berkhamsted—I heard in 1923 a similar gathering of village choirs sing together a couple of Acts of Gluck's 'Orpheus,' with professional soloists and orchestra. And I must not forget to mention that you may hear a splendid example of the same thing at the old-established People's Palace meeting, and, on a smaller scale, at the South-East London Festival. If anybody tells you that a competition festival cannot flourish without dour throat-cutting contests for pots and other prizes, don't believe them. I hasten to say that what I have stated must not be taken to imply that the other kind of festival is not a fine thing. It is; but I venture to think it is a less fine thing than those I have described. (I add, too, that the non competitive element is to be met with occasionally in the North; at present, however, it seems to be rather a feature of the South, especially of Surrey and Hampshire.) Anyway, what I have tried to do is to show that the climatic and temperamental differences between the North and South are factors that cannot be ignored in a discussion of the musical merits of those parts of the country. In fact, they are so vital as to make critical comparison almost impossible.

Inevitably this topic raises the question as to the natural endowments of various parts of the country so far as vocal material is concerned. The popular opinion is that the North is blessed with better voices than the South. Certainly the choralists in that part sing with more power. The broader vowels have something to do with the matter, no doubt; but probably the chief reason is that for generations there has been more large-scale choral singing in the North than in the South (chiefly because of the huge industrial population, to whom choral singing would naturally appeal as the easiest and least expensive form of communal art), and that this choral singing has generally been concerned with music of a type in which power rather than subtlety had full scope. This must have developed a traditionally robust type of singing. I have not space to go into this question, but readers who want a reasoned statement on the strength and weakness of Northern choralism generally should read the article entitled 'Music in Yorkshire,' by Dr. Bairstow, in Music and Letters of October, 1920. (In this connection it is fair to say that what applies to Yorkshire applies to Lancashire.) Granted the vigour of Northern choirs, what of the actual voices as heard singly and in small numbers? Some good evidence on this point was given by Mr. Plunket Greene and Mr. Hugh Roberton at the Competition Festivals Conference a year or two ago. As a result of judging in all parts of the country, both expressed their opinion that fine vocal material was very evenly distributed between N., S., E., and W. For some years past my work has taken me over a wide area on both sides of the Tweed, and also across the Irish Channel. I have missed no chance of dropping in at any Festival that I happened to run across. (It is remarkable how frequently the local festival coincided with my visit. Were I not a modest man, I might almost feel that the organizers knew I was coming.) As a result of pretty close listening here are some experiences. (No; I don't forget what I said above concerning the futility of comparing performances heard at long intervals and distances apart. I am merely going to mention certain impressions of a general kind that have been left on my mind after some years of choir-tasting far and wide.) The finest lot of women's choirs I have heard, so far as material was concerned, was in Cornwall; the best mixed choirs of about forty or fifty voices—in Hampshire and Kent; the best large male-voice choirs—Nottingham, Glasgow, and Belfast; the best large mixed-voice choirs—Blackpool; the best junior choirs (girls of 14-16)—Glasgow and London; the best school-singing, elementary and secondary—London, Bedford, and Kent; the best contralto solo voices—Bristol. It must be understood, of course, that this verdict does not always apply to actual performance so much as to material. Sometimes it applies to both.

Thus, I am quite clear about the South generally being better than the North so far as school-singing is concerned. (My 'North' in this sentence does not go beyond the Border. School singing at Scottish festivals is almost invariably of very high standard.) My experience is that the South has the pull in quality and quantity. (In this connection I seem to remember a school choir from the East End of London going to a big Northern Festival some years ago and bagging the chief honours.) Probably the Southern progress in school-singing is due to the education authorities in certain parts backing up the local festival by granting facilities and (I believe) actual financial help to competing schools. For example, at Bedford this year, I understand that about a hundred and fifty school choirs are taking part, with official support of the most practical kind.

Going back by way of finale to the question as to where the best choirs of to-day are to be found, I give the palm to Yorkshire for power, but not for beauty of tone, subtlety of expression, or skill in tackling out-of-the-way harmonic and rhythmic problems. For this kind of merit we look rather to a few choirs whose training and experience take them over a far wider field than is covered by any Yorkshire choir. Recalling some choral experiences of the past few years, the outstanding performances in my memory are those of the Philharmonic Choir with Delius's 'Song of the High Hills' and unaccompanied items by Holst and Vaughan Williams; the Oriana Choir's second performance of Bax's 'Mater Ora Filium,' and the Newcastle Bach Choir's singing of the 'Great' Service of Byrd, at St. Margaret's, Westminster. The last-named was notable for the mastery of rhythmic difficulties. For tonal splendour I single out the Leeds Choral Union's performance of 'The Apostles,' at Queen's Hall, in 1922. Turning up some notes I made at the time, I find that the magnificence of the tone, the balance, and the clear-cut articulation were the strong points. Much of what was said above is borne out by the fact that I noted as faults a want of appeal in the quieter passages, some poor phrasing, and a lack of sostenuto in the quieter singing generally—each of these faults being of a type that we are not accustomed to find in the (vocally) less well-equipped London and Newcastle bodies. What these splendid Yorkshire choirs need is a season or two of grinding at works, old and new, which call for musicianship, elasticity, and subtlety, rather than power. When they can sing Byrd and Bach as well as the Newcastle Bach Choir; Bax, Delius, Holst, and Vaughan Williams as well as the Philharmonic; and madrigals as well as the Oriana Singers, we of the South will be prepared to give the North best in this matter of choralism.

I think it was Mr. Ernest Newman who, a few years ago, annoyed at a want of abandon in the Oriana Choir, made damaging comparisons between its singing and that of Northern choirs, and added his opinion that the shortcoming would disappear if the tenors and basses occasionally beat their wives. Mr. Newman knows far more than I do about the domestic habits of the North, so I presume his implication as to the source of Yorkshire's choral excellence is well-founded. Nevertheless, I do not feel that supremacy achieved at such a cost is likely to attract us Southerners. In our weak, soft-hearted way, we shudder as we visualise a bass of the Heckmondwike Harmonic, with the annual performance of 'The Creation' in view, takin' t' stick to t' missus.

Away back in September, 1923, discussing some questions concerning notation, I alluded to the fact that our present system, though full of absurdities, frequently gives us highly decorative passages, especially when a systematic figure of an undulating character is used throughout. I mentioned certain of the Preludes of the '48,' and some pages of Chopin, and drew attention to the very pretty design in Stravinsky's 'Danse du Diable' from 'L'Histoire du Soldat,' wherein four crotchets are clumped together in a very unusual and picturesque manner. I have lately come across some more examples in a Sonata for violoncello and pianoforte by Tcherepnin. Thus, the third movement opens with nearly twenty bars in which the left-hand does nothing but repeat B flat and B natural struck together, and noted in this way:

Ex. 1 Allegretto

When this queer left-hand part comes to an end, it is only to branch out into this cluster:

Ex. 2

There are many other conglomerations of the kind throughout, but I have space to do no more than quote a bar from the second movement, in which the 'cellist and pianist both have a similar sort of thing:

Ex. 3

One naturally asks why a simpler method was not adopted. In Ex. 1, for instance, the notation might have been B flat and C flat; in Ex. 2, F natural and G flat. Presumably the composer was anxious to make it clear that he was juxtaposing major and minor tonalities.

Miss Kate Cholditch-Smith writes, pointing out that the highly-condensed report of her lecture is responsible for the somewhat startling dicta on singing quoted in these columns last month. I have space enough to say only that her letter shows that she doesn't really think that 'deep breathing is a creation of the Devil,' or that a closed mouth is essential to singing. The danger of making pungent and sweeping generalisations during a lecture is that the local reporter seizes on them as 'good copy,' and has no use for the more ordinary context which makes them clear.

THE SONG-CYCLE IN ENGLAND: SOME EARLY 17TH-CENTURY EXAMPLES

By Jeffrey Mark

In the course of an article which appeared in the October, 1924, number of the Musical Times, I had occasion to refer to a song-cycle which is included in Thomas Ravenscroft's 'A Briefe Discourse' (1614). Considerations of space alone prevented me from treating it at any length then, and I was merely able to mention it and quote the text of the second section. This cycle, however, proved to be so interesting, intrinsically and historically, that I determined at some future date to write further upon it. This, with the permission of the Editor, I am now setting out to do.

In the October article, I referred to 'Hodge and Malkyn' (under which title the cycle appears in 'A Briefe Discourse') as possibly the first song-cycle we have in England—and, perhaps, anywhere else. This honour had already been claimed by my friend, Mr. James Walter Brown, of Carlisle, for a song-cycle written by Richard Nicholson, the first Heather Professor of Music at Oxford University. I have not been able to determine definitely which came first, but such a differentiation is of small importance when put up against Mr. Brown's discovery that song-cycles (which are always considered to be a peculiarly 19th-century development) were written and sung two hundred years before then. But while a comparison of these two will not finally establish the priority of either, it will probably be the best way to consider them.

Mr. Brown puts his case in the Cornhill Magazine for May, 1920 (the MS. books which contain the cycle are in his possession, and are further described in the same magazine for September, 1921). There he quotes the definition of a song-cycle as given by Grove (see under 'Liederkreis, Liedercyclus, or Liederreihe'):

> A circle or series of songs relating to the same object and forming one piece of music. The first instance of the thing, and the first use of the word, appears to be in Beethoven's Op. 98, 'An die ferne Geliebte, Ein Liederkreis von Al. Jeitteles. Für Gesang und Pianoforte . . . von L. van Beethoven.' This consists of six songs, was composed April, 1816, and published in the following December:

and is able to show quite convincingly that

> . . . whereas the song-cycle has hitherto been supposed to have its origin in Germany so late as the 19th century, it has recently been (his) good fortune to discover one which was composed by an Englishman at Oxford three hundred years ago.

Nicholson's cycle is a setting, for three voices, of a poem in eleven sections describing the wooing of John and Joane. The first section, along with the music, I give below. Mr. Brown has only the Altus and Bassus books of what was once a set of five, but these contain not only the complete words of the poem but also the Triplex and Bassus parts of the music. The Medius part (in small notes) I have supplied myself, so that it can be played over on the (inevitable) pianoforte :

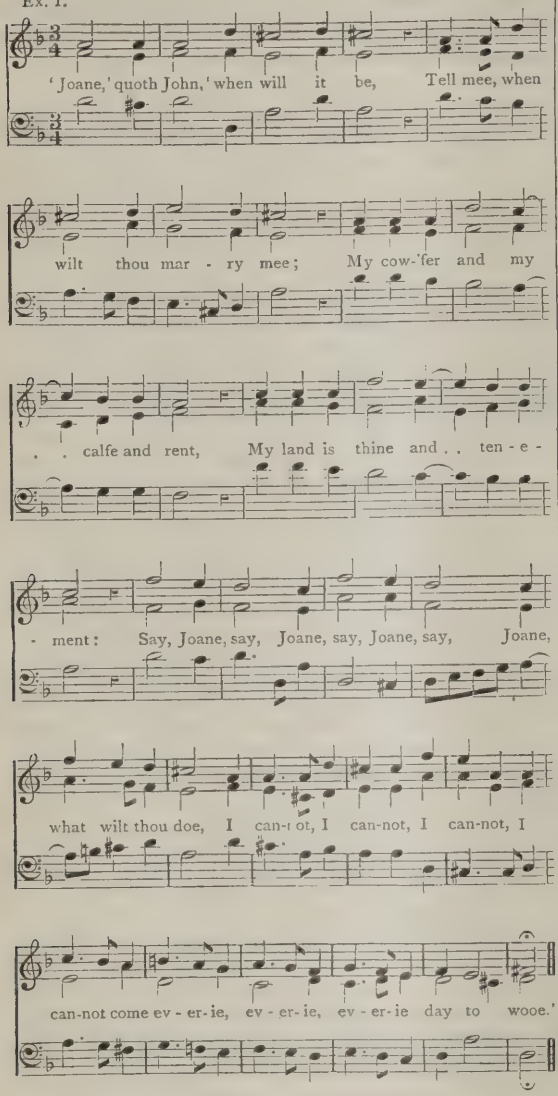
Ex. 1.



'Joane,' quoth John,' when will it be, Tell mee, when wilt thou mar - ry mee; My cow-'fer and my
. . calfe and rent, My land is thine and . . ten - e -
- ment: Say, Joane, say, Joane, say, Joane, say, Joane, what wilt thou doe, I can-not, I can-not, I can-not, I can-not come ev - er-ie, ev - er-ie, ev - er-ie day to wooe.'

This, the first stanza of the poem, is more or less traditional. As in the case of 'The Wooing Song of a Yeoman of Kent's Son' ('I have house and land in Kent'—referred to and quoted in my October article), the enumeration of the goods and gear of the prospective bridegroom or the corresponding declaration by the bride's father of his daughter's bridal portion (or 'tocher') is a necessary preliminary to all wooing matches, and, as such, a favourite theme which is used in many other English and Scottish variants of the same poem. The remaining ten sections, however, of Nicholson's cycle do not run along the customary lines. Strictly speaking, one or other should continue with his or her list of worldly possessions until some sort of an agreement is arrived at. In this case, the familiar first stanza, with its last line, 'I cannot come every day to woo,' is used as a kick-off for the cycle, but the remainder of the poem was no doubt hitched on to it by some 'rhyme-jingling companion' of the composer's. Sections 2 and 3 are of the conventional adulatory type, but in Section 4 we are suddenly made aware that Joane is sick 'and vext with mickle pain.' By the end of the next section we are shocked to hear that Joane is dead, while Nos. 7 and 8 give expression to John's lamentations on this sudden misfortune. No. 9, however, as suddenly proclaims that Joane 'is reviv'd again,' and John's joy knows no bounds. It is at No. 10 that the descent 'from pathos to bathos' occurs—a change that affects me not rudely in spite of the 'charming picture of tender love and tragic woe' of the first nine sections, and the rough comedy of the last two. It appears that Joane is not too nice in her tastes, and that an over-indulgence in 'raddish and turnips' had brought about her recent sudden and dangerous indisposition. John is admonitory, not only on the subject of radish and turnips, but also on that of 'kissing and culling,' which he describes as 'flame-catching fuel'. Now, however, that his love is well once more, she is again the tart and self-willed Joane which (maybe) John knows only too well. The text of her reply to John's warning, which brings the cycle to a close, is given here :

John be contented and care not for mee :
I cannot, I will not be ruled by thee.
Kissing and culling is lover's delight ;
then say what you will (John) for Joane will have right :
Raddish and turnips (John) ladies love well, though bagpipes and bellowes bee windie and swell.
John if you love me as love you require, come kisse me and kill me, such death I desire.

The cycle has been described in some detail to show that both the poet and composer have deliberately anticipated a development in song form which even composers writing since Beethoven have not altered to any considerable extent. 'The structure and sequence of the lyrics—which in the MS. are numbered consecutively from 1 to 11,' the succession of moods, in turn adulatory, mournful and rejoicing, and (generally) pathetic and farcical (obviously engineered in the poem so as to give the composer an opportunity to show the variety of his art), and the fact that it is set throughout in D minor—all go to show that the thing was imagined from the beginning as a complete whole.

The same thing is evident in the case of the Ravenscroft cycle. Here the poem is in dialect, and the four sections are concerned respectively with the following stages in the wooing of Hodge and Malkyn :

(1.) Hodge Trillindle to his Zweet hort Malkyn.
(2.) Malkinz anzwer to Hodge Trillindle.
(3.) Their Gongluzion.
(4.) Their Wedlocke (set by John Bennet).

To keep up the feeling of unity still further all other instructions and headings are in dialect. It is set 'vor Dreble, Meduz, Denor, ond Bazis,' while notes are added that this is the 'Vurst bart,' that the 'Zegund bart vollowes'—and so forth. It is all in F major, and I can recognise certain casual phrases and figures which are common to two or more of the sections. This may be accidental, or in some cases due to what may be characteristically Elizabethan turns of (musical) expression, but if it is deliberate, the cycle is still more remarkable in its anticipatory qualities. To show this would take up space which I prefer to use in giving some actual extracts. The text of the first section (Hodge's avowal) is given below :

Coame Malkyn, hurle thine oyz at Hodge Trillindle,
And zet azide thy Distave and thy spindle,
a little tyny let a ma brast my minde, to thee which I have vound as ghurst as ghinde;
yet loave ma (Zweet, Zweet, Zweet) a little tyny vit, and wee a little Wedelocke wooll gommit.
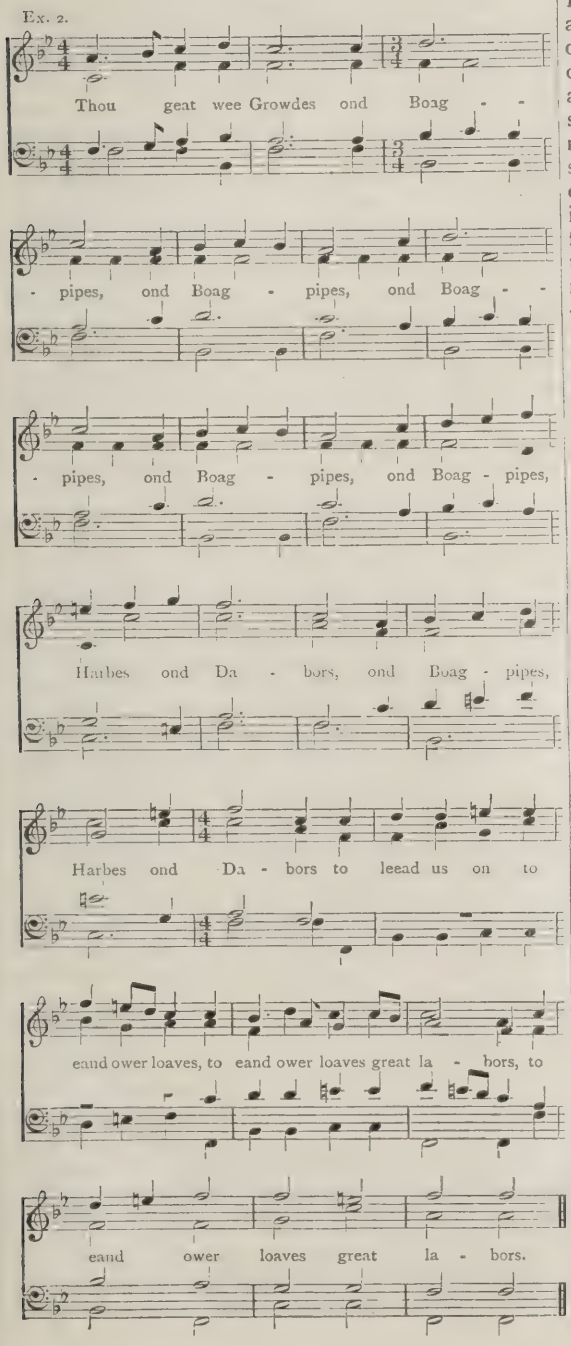
Y vaith wooll wee.

The words of 'Malkinz anzwer' will be found in the October article, and below I give the words and music of part of the third section ('Their Gonglusion'), which describes the preparations for the union with Crowds (fiddles), Bagpipes, Harps, and Tabors. (The short phrase of eight notes sung in Canon between the treble and tenor, I somehow imagine to be some recognisable fragment taken from a popular song of the time):

Ex. 2.



Thou geat wee Growdes ond Boag - -
- pipes, ond Boag - pipes, ond Boag - -
- pipes, ond Boag - pipes, ond Boag - pipes,
Harbes ond Da - bors, ond Boag - pipes, Harbes ond Da - bors to leead us on to eand ower loaves, to eand ower loaves great la - bors, to eand ower loaves great la - bors.

Bennet's last chorus is a cheerful and brisk setting in the following strain:

A Borgens, a borgens vor weale or vor woe,
So even let dis bleasing Burden goe.

Before giving the few facts which bear on the question of priority (as to date), it is only fair to say that whereas the Nicholson cycle is written definitely for three solo voices, there are indications in 'Hodge and Malkyn' that parts were for 'verse' and others for 'chorus.' In practice this probably meant that in the verse parts the treble, tenor, or medius voice sang the words to their notes, while the viols played the remaining three parts; and that, in the chorus parts, all four voices sang together 'in harmony' and were no doubt doubled by the viols. In short, a consort for solo voices, chorus, and viols, and, as such, taking on some of the characteristics of the cantata as well as the song-cycle. But definition on 'points of form' alone is a dangerous and misleading business. On such considerations some of the most characteristic types in other musical (or literary and dramatic) species are themselves hybrids. Thus 'Comus,' which the majority of people will think of as soon as the word 'masque' is mentioned, is not really a masque at all, but simply a fantastic play with incidental music. In spite of this, I shall continue to think of 'Comus' as a masque, and of 'Hodge and Malkyn' as a song-cycle —which it certainly is, in spirit and unconscious intention.

But to get down to the subject of date. With regard to Ravenscroft's claim, all that can be said is that his 'Hodge and Malkyn' was written some time during or before 1614. From external considerations applied in the same way to 'Joane, quoth John,' Nicholson must yield the honour, for inside the cover of each volume appears the autograph of the owner (and copyist), 'Thomas Smith. Jan. 8. An: 1637'

Mr. Brown, however, in his article, not only gives an excellent account of the cycle, but also ingeniously reconstructs the conditions under which the cycle was composed and sung. He shows fairly conclusively that the part-books were copied out by Thomas Smith* to be used by a small glee party at Oxford, which included himself and Nicholson as well as two others, Roger Smith at Magdalen and Henry Edmondson of Queen's. Thomas Smith and Edmondson were younger men (the former was born in 1614 and the latter about 1607), but were up at Queen's together certainly while Nicholson was organist at Magdalen (1595-1639). But the former did not come into residence until 1631 (i.e., eight years before Nicholson's death), and if, as Mr. Brown is inclined to think, Nicholson's cycle was composed specially for the little musical society of which Thomas Smith was a member, then of course it cannot have been written before this date. Here Ravenscroft still has the advantage by at least seventeen years.

But I feel that I cannot hold Mr. Brown so rigidly to his own conclusions here, as it is possible that Nicholson's cycle was written much earlier in his life, and that Thomas Smith, then an undergraduate of Queen's, simply copied it into the part-books from a MS. of Nicholson's already in existence. Nicholson was an older man even than Ravenscroft, and if he could write a madrigal for 'The Triumphs of Oriana' in 1601, he could certainly write his song-cycle before 1614. But it is useless to discuss this point further. The facts have been put forward, and there is no means of deciding. The peculiar thing is that two song-cycles should suddenly appear about the same time, and so long before the song-cycle, as a type, was established. And here, before suggesting that these two are quite isolated examples, I must make one reservation, at any rate, in favour of another composition by Nicholson.

This I found in the British Museum. While trying to discover whether the three missing books of Mr. Brown's set were there, I came across another complete set of six part-books (Add. MSS. 17,786-91) which were of exactly the same size and appearance, and were bound together under parchment covers in the same way as Mr. Brown's two books. What is more, the handwriting is the same, so that there can be little doubt that these MS. books are another set used by 'the little Musical Society at Oxford.' The most interesting thing about them, from the point of view of this article, is that they contain a setting, for five voices, of what is called a dialogue—'Joane, quoth John,' also by Richard Nicholson. At first I imagined that this must be another version of Nicholson's other cycle, re-arranged for five voices, but on scoring and comparing I found it to be entirely different in both words and music. What transpires is that this is a part of what was evidently another song-cycle, written from the point of view 'Joane to John,' and thereby complementary to the other, which is (largely) 'John to Joane.' That it is in at least four sections is shown by the fact that the two preserved in these books are numbered 3 and 4 respectively.

The setting of dialogues, usually the nymph and shepherd conversations later popularised by Henry Lawes, John Jenkins, and many others, was just then becoming fashionable, and it is evident that Nicholson was led on from this to compose his song-cycles. The substantial difference is that whereas the dialogues were quick interchanges of short scraps of talk (usually) between a male and female voice, Nicholson gives room for each to express his, or her, sentiments at some length, and does not admit of any interruptions in either case. We have, as a result of this, what we may regard either as two complete song-cycles linked together by the nature of the subject, or one cycle in two main parts (each part, of course, being further subdivided into the usual sections). Ravenscroft's cycle similarly springs from the dialogue-form, although the last two sections (their conclusion and wedlock) are a happy development which makes it still more representative. Below are the words of Part 3 of the British Museum cycle, which go to show that Joane's 'more coming-on disposition' noted (but not apprehensively) by Mr. Brown in the last section of the other cycle, has developed into something quite aggressive in this :

> John, quoth Joane, is there such hast, > looke ere you leape least you make wast ;
> if hast you have with mee to wedd,
> more belonges to a brides bed :
> Wherefore thus must you do,
> daie and night come every howre to wooe.

While making such claims as I have for these cycles, I realise that it was quite common (more particularly at a still earlier period) to write carols, secular songs, and sometimes madrigals and anthems, in sections. William Newark, Master of the Chapel Royal Children in the second half of the 15th century, has two 'songs,' each in two sections, in the British Museum (Add. MS. 5,465), and Richard Davy (born c. 1470) has a carol in three sections, another in four ('Ah, blessed Jesu'), as well as a song in two ('Jhoone is sike') in the same MS. William Cornyshe, also, who was born about the same time, has a carol in four sections in this MS., as well as a song in four parts, printed in Hawkins's 'History of Music.' The first lines of each part are given below, and will afford some idea of its quality :

(1.) 'Ah beshrew you, by my fay.'
(2.) 'By gode, ye be a prety pode' (pretty body).
(3.) 'I wiss ye dele uncurteslie.'
(4.) 'Walke forthe your way.'

But it would be stretching the letter, and certainly the spirit of the definition 'song-cycle' too far to include most, at any rate, of these earlier works. In some cases, the connection between any two sections is scarcely apparent, and in others a longish poem is simply cut up into chunks of convenient length so that each can be given a separate musical setting more or less complete in itself. There are some few which might possibly pose as song-cycles under a very loose definition of the term, but these of Nicholson and Ravenscroft are certainly the first I have come across which can fairly claim a satisfactory priority. I wonder if there is anything between 1614 and 1816 in the way of song-cycles or quasi song-cycles, which will go to show that the early achievement of these two men is not quite so remarkable as it seems to be?

NEW LIGHT ON LATE TUDOR COMPOSERS

By W. H. Grattan Flood

VII.—William More

Considering that William More was Harper to Henry VIII., Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth, and that he was a well-known composer, it is surprising that even scant details of his life have previously been absent from our musical histories. Yet John Case, of Woodstock, in his 'Apologia Musices' (1588), alludes to the favours bestowed on English musicians, including Taverner, Blitheman, Tallis, and More.

William More was born circa 1492, and became blind at an early age—displaying, however, a wonderful taste for the harp. His fame reached the Court in 1510, and in 1511 he was appointed one of the two royal harpers, the other being also a blind performer known as 'Blind Dick.' His first recorded appearance at Court functions was in the pageant presented by Cornish, at Greenwich, on New Year's Day, $15\frac{11}{12}$, on which occasion 'Blind Dick and Blind More,' as we read, 'wore their proper dress of yellow damask.'

Between the years 1512 and 1519 sundry payments and gratuities were given to William More, and, in the year 1520, at Shrewsbury, he was handsomely entertained by the Corporation, the official entry duly recording payment 'for refreshment given to William More, King's Minstrel, who is not only blind, but is the principal Harper of England' (principalis citherator Angliæ). Other payments are recorded in the King's Books between the years 1520 and 1536.

On April 3, 1537, Thomas Cromwell bestowed a gift of 7s. 6d. on William More, and he gave him a similar douceur in 1538. Notwithstanding these gifts, More stood steadfast by the old religion, and there is an interesting notice of his services to Abbot Cook, of Reading, in Cardinal Gasquet's 'Henry VIII. and the English Monasteries' (revised edition, 1906). In 1539, Abbot Cook had communication with two other Benedictine Abbots, who were subsequently martyred, namely, Blessed Richard Whiting, of Glastonbury, and Blessed Thomas Marshall (Beche), of Colchester :

> When the more active measures of persecution, devised by Cromwell, made personal intercourse impossible, a trusty agent was found in the person of a blind harper named More, whose affliction and musical skill had even brought him under the kindly notice of the King. This staunch friend of the Papal party, whose blindness rendered his mission unsuspected, apparently travelled about from one abbey to another, encouraging the imprisoned monks, bearing letters from house to house, and, doubtless, finding a safe way of sending on to Rome the letters which they had written to the Pope and Cardinals.

A ribald contemporary writer thus commented on More's doings :

> I wiss, More, thou wrestest thine harp-strings clean out of tune and settest thine harp a note too high when thou thoughtest to set the bawdy bishop of Rome above the King's majesty.

On November 15, 1539, the Abbots of Reading, Glastonbury, and Colchester were martyred, and on November 20, William More was committed to the Tower (Brit. Mus. Cott. MSS. Titus B), but was released before the end of the year, as his services were required at Court for a pageant on New Year's Day, 1540. Six months later Cromwell was beheaded. More received his customary 3*s.* a month from 1540 to 1543, and in January, $15\frac{43}{44}$, the Princess Mary gave him a gift of five shillings.

More retained office as Court Harper under Edward VI. and Queen Mary, and in 1554 he had a fee of £18 5*s.* a year. Between the years 1554 and 1560 his services were in request for the Court plays, and he was retained in office by Queen Elizabeth, though known to be an avowed Roman Catholic, just as was Sebastian Westcote, organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. By warrant dated June 3, 1559, he was given a salary of 12*d.* a day, to be paid quarterly, 'for life.'

On December 11, 1561, More received livery as Court Harper, but a year later he fell into ill-health, and passed peacefully away on the Feast of the Annunciation, 1564. The official entry in the Declared Accounts (Audit Office) for the year ending Michaelmas 7 Eliz., runs as follows :

> Musicians—William More, harper, due for half a year ending at the Annunciation, at which time he died.

There is a fragment of one of More's compositions in the Harleian MS. 7,578, among part-books containing pieces by Aston, Heath, More, Mundy, and R. Johnson. An anthem of his is included in Add. MSS. 30,480-4, dating probably from 1560, while there are anthems and motets by him in Add. MSS. 31,226 and 4,900. His 'Levavi oculos,' arranged for four strings is inscribed : 'Wyllyam More, harpour to Edward VI.' (Add. MSS. 30,480-4).

TWO UNPUBLISHED LETTERS OF BEETHOVEN

By Jean Chantavoine

(Authorised Translation by Fred Rothwell)

I have lately had the opportunity—which I seized with delight and gratitude—of glancing at a precious collection of autographs belonging to the famous prima donna Pauline Viardot, and I am now privileged to copy from it two letters, written by Beethoven, which are not to be found even in the most complete editions of the works dealing with the master.

Both of these letters, though they do not tell us anything essential of Beethoven's life or art, at all events possess the singularly vivid interest of fitting into a series of letters and facts already known, and filling in the gaps of an historical dossier. At the stage now reached in the exegesis of Beethoven's life and work, it does not appear as though one could expect anything more in the future from an unpublished document.

I.

The first of these two letters is a note, written in ink, every word in Beethoven's handwriting. Here is the original text, along with the English translation :

> Es dürften bis morgen abend wohl sicher noch die 2 overturen folgen, und so wird ihnen geholfen, jedoch mit der äussersten Anstrengung. Schreiben sie mir gefälligst, dass man in Graz sicher alles erwartete erhalte, jedoch muss man sich im voraus gefasst machen zur Probe, da die sachen mit dem postwagen zwar nicht zu spät aber auch nur eben zur rechten zeit ankomen werden.—Beethoven.

[Translation]

> It is almost certain that the two overtures will follow to-morrow evening, and so you will be out of your difficulty, though the trouble has been very great. Be good enough to write telling me that everything expected has been received at Graz, but we must be ready beforehand for the rehearsal, for with the postchaise everything will surely pass off not too late, and just at the right time.—Beethoven.

At the back of this note is the following remark, written in ink :

> Dieses Billet war an mich geschrieben,—Rettich : und ich erhielt den 23. Marz.

[Translation]

> This note was addressed to me,—Rettich : and I received it on the 23rd of March.

The said note deals with the benefit concert given by the Ursulines of Graz in 1812, in view of which concert Beethoven had supplied the orchestral requisites. The person to whom it was written, Rettich (whom Otto Jahn calls Öttich, and whom Beethoven in another letter also designates by the letter O), had to do with the convent management. Perhaps he was the steward, or bursar ; this would explain the initial 'O' (German Ökonom). The two Overtures in question are those of 'The Ruins of Athens' (Op. 113) and of 'King Stephen' (Op. 117).

The Graz concert was the occasion of a correspondence between Beethoven and Varena, the imperial procureur of Graz. About the end of January, 1812, Beethoven wrote to Varena regarding the intended concert, sending at the same time an oratorio ('Christ on the Mount of Olives') and the Fantasia with chorus (Op. 80) :

> You will also [he said] receive an introduction to 'The Ruins of Athens,' the score of which I will have copied for you as soon as possible, and afterwards a great overture for the First Benefactor of Hungary.* Both of these belong to two works which I composed for the Hungarians on the occasion of the inauguration of their new theatre; nevertheless, you will have the kindness to assure me in writing that the two works shall not be given anywhere else, for they are not printed, and will not appear in print for some time to come. You shall receive this latter overture as soon as I have received it from Hungary, which will certainly be within a few days.†

Another letter to Varena, a little later, is dated February 8, by Dr. Kalischer, the compiler of Beethoven's letters. The note above-mentioned, however, proves that this date must be postponed at least a month, for we read in the letter: ‡

I received the Overtures from Hungary only yesterday, but they shall be copied as quickly as possible.

The delay, indeed, could not have been more than a few days, and the above-written note, stating that the two Overtures would be sent on the morrow, was received at Graz on March 23.

It is true that Beethoven had had some difficulty about the copyist. This is clear from another letter to Varena,§ in which Beethoven, apologising for having missed the post when dispatching the Overtures, and dreading lest the following post should arrive too late, asks Varena to suggest some more rapid mode of despatch. Another note to Varena returns to the same question.‖

As Beethoven evidently did not receive a satisfactory answer from Varena, he addresses Baumeister, the secretary of his pupil, the Archduke Rudolph, as follows, on March 12, 1812: ¶

Please send me the Overture to the 'Nachspiel' of the first Benefactor of Hungary; it must be copied quickly, and sent at once to Graz on behalf of the poor, to be given there. I consider myself only too happy when, for such benevolent aims, my art can be used. You need only say that to H.I.H. our gracious master, and he will certainly let you have it, all the more as you know that all my own slender intellectual powers also belong to H.I.H. As soon as the Overture is copied, I will return it to H.I.H.—Yours very truly, &c.

The concert finally took place, but neither the Ursulines of Graz, for whose benefit it had been given, nor Varena, nor Rettich showed themselves in any great hurry to return the orchestral music. Consequently on May 8, 1812, Beethoven writes to Varena:

Honoured Sir,—Still ill and very busy, I could not answer your letter. How could you have had thoughts not in keeping with my character? I really ought to be angry; it would have been better if you had sent the music immediately after the concert, for that was the time when I could have had it performed here. Unfortunately it came too late, and I say unfortunately because I could not spare the venerable ladies the cost of copying. At any other time I would on no account have charged for the copying, but just at this moment I was worried with all kinds of misfortunes which prevented me doing what I should have liked. Probably Herr O., his otherwise zealous goodwill notwithstanding, delayed to inform you of this, and so I was obliged to have the copying paid to me by him.††

The following year, Beethoven on a second occasion had to send some of his compositions to the Ursulines of Graz, for another concert. This time, the sum of a hundred florins was remitted to him for copying expenses; he accepted this, believing it came through the intermediary of ex-King Ludwig of Holland, who, living in retirement at Graz, 'perhaps took many things from the Dutch, not altogether in a lawful way.'*

As we see, the above-quoted few lines, insignificant though they be to the cursory reader, are valuable to the investigator. They constitute the missing link in a relatively important chain, one that may henceforth be regarded as restored to almost full strength.

II.

The second letter, addressed to Maurice Schlesinger, the Parisian editor and founder of the well-known Gazette Musicale, was only signed by Beethoven. It was throughout written by Carl—the greatly-discredited nephew—who had a dainty, almost feminine handwriting, and frequently acted as his uncle's secretary. Here follow text and translation:

Wien, am 22*en April*, 1826.

Werther Freund,—Eben erhalte ich Ihren Brief vom 13ten April. Ich beantworte ihn eben so schnell, damit bald die Lücke, die in unserem Verkehr entstanden ist, wieder ausgefüllt werde; und melde Ihnen, dass in 14 Tagen, höchstens 3 Wochen, wieder ein neues Quartett vollendet seyn wird. Den Betrag von 80 ✣ bitte ich Sie, unverzüglich in K. K. Dukaten in Gold, anzuweisen. Machen Sie aber jetzt keinen Aufenthalt denn von allen Seiten ist jetzt Nachfrage nach Quartetten, und es scheint wirklich, dass unser Zeitalter vorrückt. Ich erfuhr aus Ihrem Schreiben, dass Sie meine Schrift missdeutet haben, denn nicht meinem Bruder, sondern Mathias Artaria habe ich das Quartett gegeben; mein Bruder aber war ebenfalls bei Biedermann. Sie sehen also wohl, dass rücksichtlich dieses Quartetts nichts mehr zu ändern ist. Die andern Quartetten und Quintetten anbelangend, die Sie zu haben wünschen, werde ich suchen, selbe baldmöglichst zu vollenden.

Für ihre freundschaftlichen Gesinnungen dank ich Ihnen herzlich: was die Reise nach London betrifft, so werde ich mich darüber bey nächster Gelegenheit erklären.

Ich bitte Sie, mit der Anweisung des Honorars zu eilen, u. mir zugleich den Ort anzuzeigen, wo ich dasselbe zu empfangen habe, gegen Ablieferung des neuen Quartetts.

Auch werde ich die Partitur des Quartetts in A moll dort abgenen; welches ich Ihnen schon längst geschickt hätte, weñ ich nur eine Nachricht von Ihnen erhalten hätte.

Ich wünsche Ihnen alles Gute u. Schöne, u. verharre stets mit Freundschaft u. Anhänglichkeit.—Ihr ergebenster, Beethoven.

Auch ich als Schreiber dieses danke Ihnen herzlich, dass Sie sich meiner erinnert haben, u. wünsche, dass Sie Ihr Versprechen uns recht bald in Wien wieder zu besuchen, in Erfüllung bringen möchten.—Karl.

Monsieur Maurice Schlesinger,
Rue de Richelieu, 97—Paris.†

[Translation.]

Vienna, April 22, 1826.

Dear Friend,—I have just received your letter of April 13. The reason I am replying so soon is that the gap that has come about in our correspondence may be filled. Within a fortnight, or three weeks at most, a new quartet will be finished. Will you kindly send me, without delay, 80 imperial gold ducats. Do not delay any longer, for now I am being asked for quartets on all sides; it really seems that the age is advancing. From your letter, I see that you misunderstood what I wrote to you, for it was not to my brother but to Mathias Artaria that I gave the quartet; my brother also happens to have been at Biedermann's. And so you see that there is no longer any change to make regarding this quartet. As regards the other quartets and quintets you wish to receive, I will endeavour to finish them as soon as possible.

I thank you heartily for your friendly feelings towards me; concerning the journey to London, I will take the next opportunity to explain myself.

Will you kindly hasten the payment of the fees, and tell me immediately where I can receive the money in return for delivery of the new quartet?

I will also enclose the score of the Quartet in A minor; I should have sent it to you long ago, had I received a line from you.

I wish you every possible good, and ever remain, in friendship and attachment,—Your most devoted,

BEETHOVEN.

I also, as writer of this letter, thank you cordially for remembering me. I desire that you speedily put into execution your promise to visit us again in Vienna.

—KARL.

Like the preceding note, this letter hints at a whole series of negotiations, and completes the correspondence relating thereto. It is known that Beethoven had indeed sold to Schlesinger, the publisher, whose firm was established both at Berlin and at Paris, the Quartet in A minor, Op. 132, and that in F, Op. 135, which appeared as posthumous works in September, 1827, six months after his death. Beethoven's connections with the Schlesinger firm have been the subject of an important study by Dr. Kalischer,* as well as of a commemorative pamphlet, full of interesting documents, published by the firm of musical productions, Robert Lienau, of Berlin,† on the occasion of the hundred-and-fiftieth anniversary of the birth of Beethoven.‡

We may compare this letter with the two published under the numbers 1,145 and 1,149 in the Kalischer edition, both addressed to Carl. The editor gives the summer of 1826, in brackets, as an approximate date. The above letter proves that this date should be three months earlier—i.e., April, 1826.

The first of these two letters is a note addressed to Carl, and written on the back of a receipt from Schlesinger. It runs as follows:

I, the undersigned, certify that I have acquired two Quartets as my own property, for one of which I will at once pay 80 ducats in gold here, and the other will be received for me in Vienna, by H——,§ of this place, who will likewise pay the honorarium of 80 ducats in gold on delivery of the same.||—M. SCHLES[INGER].

The second note is written by Beethoven to his nephew, Carl, in French:

Faites comme vous croyez de cette lettre à S[chlesinger], de donner ou que non, ce dépend tout à fait de votre intention.

Manifestly this refers to the rough copy of a letter written by Beethoven, which Carl had to copy and send to Schlesinger; doubtless this letter is the one we have just read.

To come to the contents of the letter itself, the very terms reproduce, almost word for word in places, those of the letters published by Dr. Unger in the commemorative pamphlet of the Maison Schlesinger-Lienau, under numbers 113 (Baden, July 19, 1825), 114 (copy, Baden, July 15, 1825), and 120 (Vienna, May 31, 1826).

The Quartet whose completion Beethoven announces 'within a fortnight, three weeks at most,' is that in F major. It was really finished only on October 30, 1826, at Gneixendorf, where Beethoven was staying with his brother, Johann, in the country.

The Quartet given to the Viennese publisher, Artaria, is that in B flat, Op. 130, composed in 1825, and played for the first time at Vienna by the Schuppanzigh Quartet on March 21, 1826. This Quartet had then as its Finale the 'grande fugue,' afterwards published separately (in 1827) as Op. 133. It was only in November, 1826, that Beethoven, in the Quartet in B flat, replaced the fugue by the permanent Finale.

The word 'quintet' is of particular interest in this connection. It confirms the suggestion that Beethoven was again contemplating, in the last year of his life, the writing of a work of this kind, which would have been his first since Quintet, Op. 16, for pianoforte and wind instruments (1797), and Quintet, Op. 29 (1801).*

The project of a journey to London was caressed by Beethoven and encouraged by the London Philharmonic Society, as well as by Moscheles, the pianist. Death was to prevent its realisation.

Carl alludes to the visit of Maurice Schlesinger to Beethoven in 1825, when Beethoven was en villégiature at Baden.† Carl, who is very sociable and fond of amusement, is quite naturally desirous, for his part, of seeing a repetition of such visits, which were generally accompanied by pleasant reunions in some cabaret or other.

. . . . . .

At the present time, Beethoven's life is known in sufficient detail for the slightest unpublished document relating thereto to acquire special value and importance through its connection with other documents and facts on which it throws—or from which it receives—light. Such, it seems to me, is the case with these two letters which now appear, for the first time, in the pages of Le Ménestrel.

§ According to Dr. Kalischer, this was the Viennese banker, Henickstein; the Schlesinger-Unger pamphlet conjectures the name of Ernemann, which Beethoven may have confused with that of Biedermann, Schlesinger's business man at Vienna.

|| Beethoven had already received 80 ducats from Schlesinger for the two Quartets (receipt dated September 10, 1825, published in the Schlesinger-Unger pamplet, p. 91).

(Schlesinger Unger pamphlet, No 122, p. 95.) On the other hand, in a letter to Moscheles, Schindler affirms that Beethoven, before dying, had just finished the first two movements of a string quintet, intended for the publisher Diabelli, at Vienna.

The Musician's Bookshelf

'Schubert.' Par Théodore Gérold. ('Les Maîtres de la Musique,' vol. 32.)

[Paris : Alcan, 9 fr.]

Schubert has waited rather long for his volume in this celebrated collection of Masters of Music. He comes thirty-second. This argues a lesser esteem for Schubert among French music-lovers than here. In England he would assuredly have been put long before Smetana, Moussorgsky, Lulli, Meyerbeer, and Schütz.

A good little volume has now come, written by a serious and sincere admirer of Schubert. It is true it is not the sort of book on Schubert one would have expected from a French critic. What was perhaps to be expected was a little less serious admiration and rather more vivacity and picturesqueness in 'placing' the composer. But M. Gérold is knowledgable and sound, while suppressing all inclination towards ironic expression.

English readers have of course Sir George Grove's celebrated article on Schubert, and anything more said on the subject here would have to make a very great effort indeed to supersede it. The Frenchman has not such a rival. For the Life we shall still go to Grove, who is much fuller, rather than to Gérold.

M. Gérold begins his discussion of the works by eighty-four pages on Schubert's songs. 'Although Schubert tried his hand at nearly all the shapes and forms of music, the song is the true centre of his activity.' Schubert was writing songs as a school-boy of fourteen—and songs of no ordinary sort. What influences had borne on him? M. Gérold says, first of all, Zumsteeg, then Reichardt, and, thirdly, 'some few reminiscences of Mozart.'

He gives a sketch of German song in the 18th century. Schulz is to be esteemed for having set his face against worthless song-texts. Reichardt, 'a man of ingenuity and great activity,' set to music the best German poets, and some of his songs have still 'a real musical value.' Zelter, Goethe's musical adviser, left songs which do not cut too bad a figure, even considered alongside Schubert's. But the ballads of the Stuttgart composer Zumsteeg influenced far more deeply than these men the young Schubert. There had been few Viennese song-writers. Steffan, Marie Antoinette's music-master, published an amiable and popular set. There was Mozart's 'Violet,' and the rather scanty masterpieces in this form of Beethoven's. Ranking Zumsteeg at the highest possible, one is none the less perpetually amazed at the immense advance in variety and depth of beauty made by Schubert over all his predecessors.

M. Gérold deals with the formidable mass of Schubert's songs by grouping them first according to the poets. He makes the point on p. 73 that Schubert was spurred to romantic innovations by the strange, unearthly suggestions of the poems of Ossian, which captivated him in his eighteenth and nineteenth years :

> The mysterious element predominating in these poems, the grandiose pictures of nature they contain, and the rhapsodic character of several of them, vividly struck the young man's imagination, and determined him to seek out new means of expression.

No one now reads Ossian, and no one even sings Schubert's settings. They might be looked up for one of Mr. Gerald Cooper's 'out-of-the-way' concerts, and so might Schubert's enormously long ballad (from Schiller), 'The Diver,' which M. Gérold analyses. It came a couple of years before 'The Erl-King.'

One of the strange things about that miracle, 'The Erl-King,' is that two or three years later a young North German, Loewe, without any possible knowledge of Schubert, wrote an acceptable setting to the ballad—one which, if it had not been for Schubert, would have taken the fancy of the world, as it has, indeed, taken the fancy of the Germans. M. Gérold gives us quotations from the 'Erl-Kings' of Reichardt, Zelter, and Loewe. He is generous to the little men. 'Loewe conserves better than Schubert its true ballad character.'

Some of the songs which M. Gérold discusses the most fully are : 'The Dwarf,' 'Prometheus,' 'To the Lyre,' 'The Young Nun,' 'Tartarus,' and 'Man's Limitations.' He notes by the way several of the unjustly neglected : 'Kriegers Ahnung,' the settings of Hölty, 'To the Setting Sun' (Kosegarten), and 'Sehnsucht' (Schiller). He is puzzled to know what are the three 'mock suns' at the end of 'The Winter Journey.' He suggests that two of them are the eyes of the beloved, the third the poet's life. But Mr. Fox-Strangways has told us in his argument : 'I have just seen a curious sight, three mock-suns. I once had three suns—Love, Hope, and Life. Two are set ; I wish the third were.'

When M. Gérold comes to the choral songs of Schubert the ground is much less familiar. The fine 'Song of the Spirits on the Waters' (eight-part men's choir and strings) is analysed. It is obviously the thing for Blackpool. Arriving at the pianoforte works our author, as a good Frenchman, protests against 'Moments Musicals' (for musicaux), a solecism which still appears sometimes—as does 'Moment Musicale'!—on London programmes. The faulty French was not Schubert's but that of some of his publishers. He praises the 'Grand Duo' in C for pianoforte, four hands, and reminds us that Joachim scored it. Is not that a reminder worth picking up?

The chamber musician will say that the Trios, Quartets, and Quintets are too summarily treated. M. Gérold points to one of the numerous links between Schubert and Wagner, comparing the Scherzo of the 'Death and the Maiden' Quartet with Siegfried's Forging Song.

Too little has been made of Wagner's debt to Schubert. Compare Siegmund's 'Spring Song' with Schubert's 'Erlafsee,' at the words 'Regungslos der blaue Schoos.' And is not there a germ of 'Lohengrin' in the last page of 'Die Erwartung'?

M. Gérold deplores the loss of the 'Gastein Symphony,' with a full assumption that it indeed existed as an original work of 1825. In his catalogue it figures as 'Symphony No. 8, in C major.' He does not tell us how he learnt the key of this disappeared—or, possibly, mythical—work. He suggests that Schubert may have regarded the 'Unfinished' Symphony as quite enough finished. After all, there are Sonatas of Beethoven in two movements, not known as 'Unfinished' Sonatas. The great C major Symphony 'has, indeed, in its structure something of the monstrous. But by the side of that there is in it a richness and incomparable beauty.' Sad are the few pages given to Schubert's incessant and futile attempts at success in the opera-house. Summing up, M. Gérold is quite indisposed to allow that later song-writers, such as Wolf, seriously rival his hero :

> In spite of intense labour and the resources of a much more advanced art, Wolf does not attain to the result of Schubert. Apart from some most beautiful songs of a contemplative, jovial, or dramatic character, his compositions leave us indifferent, or even repel us.

The Appendix is valuable : a full catalogue of the works, with the date of each composition, including the songs individually (German titles).

'Romantische Harmonik und ihre Krise in Wagner's "Tristan."' By Dr. Ernst Kurth.
[Berlin : Max Hesse.]

Starting from the two propositions that 'the romantic period is that during which composers were most concerned with harmony,' and that 'harmonics are reflexes springing from the unconscious,' Dr. Kurth has written a book which stands as a monument of hard work and hard thinking, and provides the reader with plenty of opportunities for both. It is a difficult book—chiefly, perhaps, because the subject is practically boundless. It is a blend of abstract æsthetics and practical analyses ; and the connection between the facts considered and the philosophy woven around them is at times elusive. The vocabulary—although there is no sign of looseness in the way Dr. Kurth uses his words—is in itself baffling.

There can be no questioning the interest, generally speaking, of the thorough analyses of processes, of their origin and consequences—technical and æsthetic—which Dr. Kurth gives ; devoting, for instance, fifty pages to the first chord in 'Tristan,' and the part played by it throughout the score.

Each process is thus described and dissected, compared with similar processes used by other composers, from Schütz and Bach to Moussorgsky and Turiña.

Some time ago a pamphlet was issued to serve as introduction and guide to Schönberg's 'Treatise of Harmony.' If something of the kind was done for Dr. Kurth's book, it would be, I am sure, of great benefit to the average student.

'Grundlagen des Linearen Kontrapunkts.' By Dr. Ernst Kurth.
[Berlin : Max Hesse.]

Of nearly equal bulk is this other work by Dr. Kurth. And here again the reader will do well carefully to ascertain and commit to memory the full meaning of each term used if he wishes to follow the author's progress—which is certainly not along the line of least resistance. However, we are on firmer, better defined ground. Once the initial difficulties are mastered, we find that we are learning a good deal from Dr. Kurth's handling of his subject. The third part, devoted to Bach's melodic style, occupies about two-fifths of the book, and every word in it is worth reading and digesting—that is, provided it be granted that there is something to learn from the scrupulous investigation of every particular, however minute, of a great composer's music. Nothing of the kind has yet been attempted with regard to Bach's style. One of Dr. Kurth's chief merits is that he deals with the musical aspect of the matter only, without ever a word of the associate significance upon which other writers—Schweitzer, for instance—lay a good deal of stress.

Again I think that a digest might be issued in order to facilitate the study of this most useful contribution to the technical literature of music.

'Prince Serge Wolkonsky : My Reminiscences.'
[Hutchinson. Two vols., 36*s*.]

Prince Serge Wolkonsky was director of the Russian Imperial Theatres for two years, 1899-1901. He was born with a silver spoon in his mouth. He had not only birth and wealth, but also brains and a keen sensibility for the Arts ; and at the end of his two volumes we decide that he had a good heart too. A very gentle, music-loving Muscovite prince :

> And now [he says, writing at Moscow in 1921], having been cast out of the room in which there is a pianoforte, I have not played on one for nearly five years. I am told that I, as a 'professor,' have a right to a pianoforte and also to two rooms, but I cannot count that as a right after which one has to hunt.

He marvellously survived the great upheaval, and the very moderation in the telling of his story the better brings home the nightmare of it. After he had seen his estates laid waste, his library rifled, his friends and relations murdered, it was a comparatively small thing to be deprived of a pianoforte, but it was a very real deprivation. The Prince is a musician.

He came of an art-loving family. In his young days Tchaikovsky encouraged his musical ambition ; but not so Anton Rubinstein. In a Petersburg drawing-room a hostess demanded of our author that he should sit down to the pianoforte after Rubinstein ('just imagine, after Rubinstein !'), and play some of his compositions. Afterwards he heard that Rubinstein said : 'He has capacities, but nothing will come of them—he is a Prince.'

We have often heard the story of the aspiring youth whose artistic ambitions are crushed by poverty and obscurity. Prince Wolkonsky, through the very eminence of his family, was doomed to be frustrated, and to be a dilettante all his life. Still, until 1917, he had a good life. He heard everybody, knew everybody.

He describes the four singers who made the greatest impression on him. They were Panaeva, for whom Tchaikovsky wrote his songs ; Alice Barbi ; the Wagnerian soprano, Litvinne ; and the fourth, Madame Jean de Reszke (née de Mailly). The Prince accompanied Patti when she sang at Petersburg in 1905. Afterwards he said to her young Swedish husband, 'How wonderfully she sings !' and had the answer, 'Yes, is it not wonderful how well my wife's voice has been preserved—and at her age, too !'

In Prince Wolkonsky's young days, Italian opera was the rage with fashionable Russians :

> Italianism was the height of art—they could not feel Russian music at all. Rimsky-Korsakov called forth laughter and derision. I was at the first performance of 'Boris Godounov' ; the opera failed completely amid hisses and laughter.

Russian opera was given its chance by a fine, bold, autocratic stroke :

> As long as the Italians were at Petersburg, the Russian opera could not develop. The decided step that Alexander III. took—the suppression of the Italian opera—was necessary to raise the Russian opera. By his order the Italian opera was abolished, and the Great Theatre was given over to the Russian opera ; the public had no option. There are certainly not many examples in the history of art where an entirely extraneous and mechanical measure has had such inner influences. Placed in the front rank, deprived of rivals, the Russian opera developed till in a few years it attained a degree of independent value.

Tchaikovsky formed a bridge between Verdi and Rimsky-Korsakov, and Prince Wolkonsky allows him a very important historical function, but small intrinsic worth :

The whole of Tchaikovsky's works will, of course, fade away into the past; they will not outlive the century; he will fade and he will fade quickly; but quite apart from his value, and with the change it will experience with years, Tchaikovsky marks a turning point.

Russian opera-singers were not always the dramatic artists we have known. Prince Wolkonsky, when director of the Imperial Theatres, was ridiculed for suggesting an improved diction :

But then Chaliapin appeared, and what the director of the theatres was unable to instil, their colleague of genius succeeded in teaching them. The singers . . . . suddenly understood that Chaliapin's whole strength lay in the part that the word played in his singing, and what an important place consonants have in sound.

Those two years in the Imperial Theatres bristled with difficulties. Opera-singers are supposed to be difficult to manage, but who says that who has tried ballet-dancers? We hear comparatively little of the singers. The dancers were the handful, and one of them, Madame Kshesinskaya, brought about his downfall—Kshesinskaya, who

. . . through the Grand Duke Sergei Mikhailovich, with whom she was living, was able to ascend as high as the Emperor, who, in memory of the close connection he had formerly had with her, granted her every request.

This charming dancer (who danced in London in one of the Diaghilev seasons) refused to wear a farthingale in a certain ballet. The director fined her. She brought the highest of influences to bear, and the fine had to be remitted, and the Prince threw up his post. The Prince had, long before that, a tiff with M. Diaghilev himself, to whom he pays, all the same, a handsome tribute. He gave to Diaghilev the editorship of the 'Annual of the Imperial Theatres.' But 'Diaghilev had a talent for raising all in opposition to himself,' and some question of discipline developed such difficulties that the brilliant editor was dismissed. 'Diaghilev is a man of strong will, capable of stepping over corpses to attain his end.' The two did not speak for ten years.

One of the Prince's achievements was the famous revival of Rimsky-Korsakov's 'Sadko,' of which that composer speaks gratefully in his memoirs. Rimsky reproaches Wolkonsky's predecessor, Vsevolozhsky, for neglect of his operas—an injustice, says our Prince, for Alexander III. was to blame. That Emperor always scratched Rimsky's name from the opera prospectus.

The volumes are diffuse, and the English is execrable (regardless of grammar, it knows no difference between 'as' and 'like,' or 'will' and 'shall'). But we get to like this musical Prince; if there had been more of his sort, Russia would hardly be in its present plight. C.
